DISCUSSIONS AND PRACTICE

...Social Environment

»» Read the passage below

People behave differently when they are alone from when they are in a group. Social environment greatly influences how humans behave. Social psychologists study the effects of groups on individuals. Social psychologists are concerned with two areas: social attitudes and group behaviour.

Social attitudes involve the actions, beliefs and feelings of people towards groups and classes of people. By studying attitudes, social psychologists are able to understand how people are attracted to one another and how they are repelled by one another.

Group behaviour involves the different ways individuals behave in groups. An example of the influence of the group on individual behaviour is the adolescent peer group. After a child reaches a certain age, his or her peer group becomes more important to him or her than the family. The peer group provides the child with a sense of identity and belonging. Parents must compete for influence with the peer group. Often, the parents lose. Children who resist the lure of the peer group often suffer rejection or ridicule.

Social psychologists have found that when people become members of certain types of groups, they become anonymous – they lose their individual identity – and become part of the crowd.

The “loss of identity” enables them to do things that they would not ordinarily do as individuals. Two examples of groups in which people do things they would not ordinarily do are mobs and vigilante groups. A positive example of a group in which people lose their individual identities is a group of rescuers working together to help victims of an earthquake.
