COMMUNICATION WORKS

Second Edition

For Matthew Jon and Lindsay Michele

Preface

In writing the second edition of Communication Works, we followed the same approach that contributed to the success of the first edition, and thus our two key goals still were (1) to motivate students to want to learn about interpersonal, small-group, and public communication and (2) to provide materials that would encourage students to internalize and practice key communication principles. Experience has shown us that after reading this book, completing the Skill Builders (exercises), and “living” the course, students develop a clear understanding of communication and handle themselves better in interpersonal, small-group, and public communication situations. As before, we strove to ensure that our text’s content, exercises, readings, and probe questions worked together systematically to precipitate active participation both in and out of the classroom. We tested the materials incorporated into the book on a variety of student groups; these materials were used to motivate and challenge students of all ages from the traditional 18 year old to the more mature adult returning to college.

We took special efforts to produce a book that students would enjoy reading. How information is presented can affect interest level, and thus we aimed to achieve clarity of language, high involvement, and a graphically alive format. Because we still believe that individuals learn better if actively involved, we maintained a wide selection of Skill Builders—in-class and out-of-class learning experiences—designed to help students look at communication, assess effects, and gain the insights and practice they need to improve their communication abilities. Of course, we do not expect you to use all the Skill Builders in a single semester. Instead, you may pick and choose from them to fit the needs of your class as well as the time available. Each Skill Builder you do use, however, will focus student attention on a specific aspect of communication, and research shows that students find that the Skill Builders help to make the study of communication active and experiential, exciting, and rewarding.

Pedagogical features that worked in the first edition have preserved in the second edition. Each chapter of Communication Works begins with a preview of behavioral objectives. The preview outlines exactly what students should be able to do after completing a chapter; in effect, objectives illuminate and specify goals and help prepare readers for what is about to occur. Included at the end of each chapter is a summary of the content that was covered and the skills that should have been gained. In addition, periodically, students are expected to complete self-assessment scales designed to aid them in measuring skill mastery. To further enhance interest, Communication Works also offers a wide array of career-oriented examples and applications, as well as side queries. The side queries are there to arouse curiosity and prompt students to ask and/or try to answer questions.

Parts I through V offer a number of other special features:

Part I. Part I's chapters on the essentials of communication offer a unified approach to the study of communication. Models, self-concept, perception, listening, language, and nonverbal communication are explored with respect to how they affect the ability to relate in interpersonal, small-group, and public communication settings. Communication Works is the only text that also examines how the media affect the development of self-image and perceptual capabilities.

Part II. Interpersonal communication is the topic of Part II, which begins with a chapter on understanding relationships. Next, Chapter 8 provides a unique view of how feelings and emotions affect and are affected by our relationships. The section includes a special segment on male and female display rules and a thorough discussion of assertiveness. Chapter 9 focuses on the employment interview; providing practical guidelines for functioning as either interviewee or interviewer. The chapter also contains suggestions for in-class role playing and gives students a number of exercises to complete in preparation for their career search.

Part III. Part III focuses on Small-group communication and provides ample group experiences for in-class use. This part examines in detail the steps involved in problem solving; reviews the roles people play in groups; provides a career-oriented discussion of leadership; looks at how cooperation and competition, defensiveness and supportiveness, and conflict affect the climate of a work group; and compares how "groupthink" and "freethink" alter a group's ability to function effectively.

Part IV. Part IV's chapters on speechmaking provide students with a straightforward format—in effect, a speechmaking map—for preparing in-class or on-the-job presentations. Exercises, speechmaking check lists, tryout sheets, and evaluation forms are included to help students as they research and develop their own speeches.

Epilogue. The last chapter, the Epilogue, provides techniques for continuing to improve communication in interpersonal, small-group, and public settings, whether on the job, in school, at home, or with friends. Communication Works is still the only hybrid text that contains suggestions and strategies for developing communication skills after the course has ended.

As an additional resource for instructors, we have prepared a comprehensive instructor's manual. It includes, for each chapter of the text, test-file questions and answers, student self-assessment scales, and additional Skill Builders.

Several changes incorporated in the new edition clarify some important issues discussed in the first edition and add to the text's usefulness. Among the most significant additions and revisions are the following:

1. Chapter 7, "Understanding Relationships," is new; it devotes special attention to the importance of interpersonal relationships and to the factors that affect the growth and/or deterioration of relationships.
2. A discussion of conflict has been added to Chapter 8, "Person to Person: Handling Emotions and Expressing Feelings in Relationships."
3. New material reflecting new insights and emphases has been added to the chapters on self-concept, listening, language and meaning, nonverbal communication, and interviewing.
4. The chapters contained in Part IV, "Communicating to the Public" have been heavily revised and expanded; the changes make the chapters more meaningful and easier to use and follow.

The improvements reflect the experiences of students and the suggestions of our colleagues; they truly are the result of a team effort. Consequently, the efforts made by our editors, evaluators, and students merit special attention. Specifically, we would like to thank Roth Wilkofsky, our acquiring editor who gave generously of his time and knowledge, Kathleen Domineg and Brian Henry, our manuscript editors, whose sensitivity to changing emphases and needs kept us on track, the book's designer, who say to it that the visual design of the work supported the content, and the following reviewers who willingly shared with us the insights and experiences that enabled us to create this work: Marsha Vanderford Doyle, University of South Florida; Albert M. Katz, University of Wisconsin-Superior; Lois I. Roach, Spokane Community College; and Robert D. Snelling, Green River Community College.

Finally, of course, we would like to thank our children, Matthew and Lindsay; their love, patience, and communication instincts made it all worthwhile.
