ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

We are indebted to a number of people and organizations for their assistance.

For financial help, direct and indirect, we owe thanks, in roughly chronological order, to Allen Wallis and James Lorie of the Graduate School of Business, University of Chicago; to Wilbur Schramm and his program for the utilization of the behavioral sciences, Stanford University; to John Gardner and his colleagues at the Carnegie Corporation of New York; to John Riley, Director of Social Research of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of America; to Lawrence Ferguson, Director of Behavioral Research Services of the General Electric Company; to Frank Notestein and other colleagues at the Population Council; and to John D. Rockefeller 3rd. They gave us the friendly encouragement that means so much in a pioneering project of this kind, where the outcome and even the effort contain a certain element of risk: can it be done at all? We remain most grateful for their support, moral as well as fiscal.

In the course of our work we have relied on many helpers and collaborators. This book would not have been as well done without their careful and loyal assistance in finding findings, checking references, verifying quotations, compiling the bibliography, keeping records, seeking permissions, doing the index, typing and retyping, and so on. As with the first group, their belief in the effort was important as well as their work. Mary Lynne Poole and Nan Reiss maintained effective control of the Chicago end of the work. Carol Bowman was remarkably efficient in managing the flow of work in New York, and contributed some editorial support as well. Donna Smith verified every quotation and citation in the book, secured all the permissions, compiled the bibliographical index, and helped with the subject index, and it is to her lasting credit that all the details were handled not only with professional competence but with good humor as well.
