Migration, Diasporas and Citizenship Series

Series Editors: Robin Cohen, Former Director of the International Migration Institute and Professor of Development Studies, University of Oxford, UK and Zig Layton-Henry, Professor of Politics, University of Warwick, UK.

Editorial Board: Rainer Baubock, European University Institute, Italy; James F. Hollifield, Southern Methodist University, USA; Jan Rath, University of Amsterdam, The Netherlands

The Migration, Diasporas and Citizenship series covers three important aspects of the migration progress. Firstly, the determinants, dynamics and characteristics of international migration. Secondly, the continuing attachment of many contemporary migrants to their places of origin, signified by the word 'diaspora', and thirdly the attempt, by contrast, to belong and gain acceptance in places of settlement, signified by the word 'citizenship'. The series publishes work that shows engagement with and a lively appreciation of the wider social and political issues that are influenced by international migration.

The ideas, research and writing in this book took shape over several years. To a long-held interest in issues of immigration, I added curiosity about nationalism and the complex realities of societies possessing not just immigrant-driven diversity, but also long-standing experience of competing national identities and aspirations for the country.

I could not have seen the project to completion without material, institutional and moral support from numerous sources. A Frank Knox Memorial Fellowship supported the PhD studies at Harvard University out of which this book emerged. Initial fieldwork was supported by a Dissertation Research grant from Harvard's Center for European Studies, and my research benefited from interaction with its Visiting Scholars and the stimulation of the Center's Study Groups. Subsequent periods of research and writing were supported by a Jean Monnet Fellowship at the European University Institute, and by grants from Victoria University of Wellington's Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences and Research Trust, the New Zealand EU Centres Network and the EU-Oceania Social Science Inter-Regional Consortium.

During periods of field research I was generously hosted by the Instituut voor Sociaal en Politiek Opinieonderzoek (ISPO) at the Katholieke Universiteit Leuven, the Chaire de recherche du Canada en études québécoises et canadiennes (CREQC) at the Université du Québec à Montréal, and by Edinburgh University's Institute of Governance. I wrote parts of the book in 2012 during a Research and Study Leave from Victoria University of Wellington. I am grateful to Professor Ruud Koopmans and Professor Catherine de Wenden for facilitating stays at the Wissenschaftszentrum Berlin and CERi, Sciences Po, respectively.

The substantive research could not have been completed without the cooperation of numerous bureaucrats, politicians and NGO workers whom I interviewed. They were generous with their time and thoughts, if sometimes perplexed about why someone had come from New Zealand to find out about issues like the complex institutional reform in Brussels. The book is also grounded in archival research. Archivists were consistently helpful as I explored documents at the Archief en Museum van het Vlaams Leven te Brussel, Amsab-Instituut voor Sociale Geschiedenis, Archief en Documentatiecentrum voor het Vlaams-nationalisme, Flemish Parliament archives, and Centre de

Documentation, Ministère de l'Immigration et des Communautés culturelles in Montreal.

For variously encouraging, challenging and providing feedback at different times during the PhD and in subsequent development of the project, I thank Peter A. Hall, Yoshiko Herrera, Paul Pierson, Susan Pharr, Annie Stilz, Hillel Soifer, Shannon O'Neil, Jonathan Laurence, Will Phelan, Mark Copelovitch, David Meskill, Rob Fannion, Irene Bloemraad, Dirk Jacobs, Marc Swyngedouw, Michael Keating, Eve Hepburn, Wilfried Swenden, Alan Trench, Alain-G. Gagnon and Ricard Zapata-Barrero. David Miller and Eamonn Callan organized the stimulating Summer Institutes for Advanced Studies on Citizenship and Migration (2007–2008). Discussions during and after these workshops with colleagues, including Christine Straehle, Patti Lenard, Elke Winter, Helder De Schutter, Dina Kiwan, Kieran Oberman and Wendy Roth, influenced my thinking on this project and on broader issues of immigration, nationalism, identity and citizenship. Thanks also to colleagues at Victoria University, especially Kate McMillan, David Capie, Hilde Coffé and Pat Moloney, for their encouragement, and to Matthew Castles, Dianny Wahyudhi and Dylan Chambers for excellent research assistance.

The greatest debts are, of course, personal. My parents, Jan and Rhys Barker, not only encouraged me through the studies that eventually led to this book, but also went beyond the call of grandparent duty with countless trips to the park, beach and river, as I brought the manuscript to completion. François Shindo has lived with this project for about as long as he has known me. Without his moral and practical support, especially during the latter stages of the writing and once Raphaël and Isabelle arrived to inject delight and chaos into our lives, completing the book would have been immeasurably harder. I am very grateful to him.

Immigrant Newcomers and the Old Politics of Nationalism

1.1 The challenge of multiple diversities

In contemporary democracies, immigration, migrant integration, and the management of diversity are the objects of robust political and social debate. In European societies, for instance, the numbers of immigrant newcomers, the place of cultural and religious diversity, and, in some countries, even the labour mobility of European Union (EU) citizens have become electorally charged. Formal demands regarding migrants' linguistic, cultural or values adaptation via 'civic integration' tests or courses have proliferated in recent years. Yet, despite some claims of convergence on immigration, integration and citizenship policies (Soysal 1994), states continue to adopt a variety of approaches regarding admissions criteria, integration requirements and the social, civic and political rights extended to both individual migrants and ethnic and religious groups (Koopmans et al. 2012).

In multinational societies like the United Kingdom, Belgium and Canada, the challenge of governing diversity is even more complex because of pre-existing debate and contestation over the claims of sub-state nations—regions that claim some degree of linguistic, cultural or national recognition or self-determination (Barker 2010; Winter 2011; Zapata-Barrero 2009). In these societies, the 'new' diversity arising from immigration meets the 'old' politics of substate nationalism, as political leaders in societies like Scotland, Flanders and Quebec confront immigration flows and immigrant integration patterns that could impact, either positively or negatively, on the substate nation's own identity and interests. For some, the presence of diverse immigrant populations challenges the substate nation's claims to cultural or linguistic distinctiveness. Moreover, immigrants' integration patterns could buttress the linguistic, cultural or political majority in the nation-state, to the detriment of the substate nation. For others, migrants might prove to be potential allies in ongoing cultural and political struggle against the central state. This is ever more relevant as migrants and their descendants increasingly possess the full political rights associated with citizenship. Thus, as Chapter 2 outlines further, migrants' arrival, presence and integration patterns have the potential to be of particular interest to substate national leaders as they continue to negotiate their relationship with the central state.

Not only might questions of immigration and integration be of interest to substate national leaders, but the global trend of decentralization of power means they are increasingly empowered to decide how to respond to migration and diversity. Under conditions of political decentralization, policy making is no longer solely the domain of the central state. Important questions therefore arise: First, how do substate national leaders respond to immigration, migrant integration and diversity? Second, what shapes their responses? Third, what is the relationship between substate nations' ongoing political and constitutional struggles with the central state, on one hand, and their relationship to immigrants in their midst, on the other? More broadly, what are the implications of political decentralization for how diversity is governed in contemporary democracies?

This book provides answers to these questions. While others have studied aspects of immigration from the perspective of federal systems (Joppke & Seidle 2012), regionalist party strategies (Hepburn 2009b), the confrontation of multinationality and multiculturalism in public discourse (Winter 2011) and the consequences of multinational politics for immigrants' sense of belonging (Banting & Soroka 2012), my focus is on the policy responses of substate governments in decentralized political systems characterized by multinationality. The comparative study of how political leaders in Quebec, Flanders and Brussels, and Scotland have responded to immigration and diversity sheds light on two phenomena that continue to challenge traditional notions of the nation and citizenship—namely, the 'old' politics of substate nationalisms and the 'new' diversity of immigration.

In response to the first, descriptive question of how substate national leaders respond to immigration, migrant integration and diversity, I show there is no single typical substate nation response. Examining the substate policy approach to immigration and integration in terms of both the relative openness to migrants' presence in the substate national community and the extent to which substate governments seek
