I. What Is International Business Law?

Economic globalization, in recent years, particularly, as the Cold War and its threat of major disaster seems to have receded, has been one of the hottest focuses in the world. Although it is extremely difficult to define economic globalization, many economists and business experts believe that no business can be purely domestic, and the realities of the modern world make all business international. The causes of these developments are numerous: incredible advances in efficiency of communication, extraordinary reductions in transport costs, growing prevalence of instant tele-and-cyber-transactions, treaty and other norms causing reduction of governmental barriers to trade, and economic climate more favorable to principles of market economics, cross-border influences of competition which have driven increases in production and service efficiencies, and, last but not least, the blessing of relative peace in the world. As a result, scholarly efforts and governmental policy studies have also been giving increased attention to international trade, legislative initiatives relating to trade, the activity of financial institutions such as the World Bank or the International Monetary Fund (IMF) (国际货币基金组织), and many other economic subjects relating to investment, competition policy, etc.

Economic policies which are based on market principles are the best approach for maximizing human satisfaction is, of course, controversial, but it is mostly believed that markets can be very beneficial to the peoples involved though not absolutely equal to all. However, what is the role of law in the economic globalization? The Nobel Prize-winning economist Ronald Coase has stated: "It is evident that, for their operation, markets... requires the establishment of legal rules governing the rights and duties of those carrying out transaction ... To realize all the gains from trade... there has to be a legal system and political order... Economic policy consists of choosing those legal rules, procedures and administrative structures which will maximize the value of production." Another Nobel Prize-winning economist said: "That institutions affect the performance of economics is hardly controversial... Institutions reduce uncertainty by providing a structure to everyday life... Institutions affect the performance of the economy by their effect on the costs of exchange and production." ①

Human institutions embrace many structures and take many forms, but it is very clear that law and legal norms play the most important part of the institutions which are essential to make markets work. In today's world, there are economically two systems of law: the public international law which includes the Bretton Wood systems(布雷顿森林体系), the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, GATT, the WTO, and the private international law including law merchant, international model law, etc.

International business law is the body of rules and norms that regulates activities carried out outside the legal boundaries of states. In particular, it regulates the business transactions of private persons internationally, and the international relationships of international commercial organizations.

In comparison with the traditional international business law, contemporary international business law covers much more extensively, such as law for the international trading of goods, company law, negotiable instrument law, maritime law, insurance law, law of international technology transfer, industrial property law, international investment law, international financial law, international tax law, law of international dispute settlement.

Taking into consideration of the tremendous scope of international business law, and the time limit of class performance of students of law, the author has to
