Traffic is undoubtedly a serious problem facing residents. The drivers are notorious for their disobedience to traffic rules. Cars, trucks, buses and motorcycles weave in and out of the traffic at dangerous speeds. Illegal passing, drunk driving and running through red lights are not unusual. What's worse, annoying traffic jams can be seen everywhere as the number of motor vehicles rapidly increases.

To solve these problems, I think the following measures must be taken immediately. First, road regulations should be strictly enacted to deter violations. Second, the authorities concerned ought to improve public transportation systems to reduce the people's need of private cars. Most important of all, drivers must be educated and even re-educated about road safety. Only by / through the cooperation between the government and the citizens can we have a better traffic condition. Perhaps one day we can really enjoy more orderly traffic.

Drunk driving has become a serious form of murder. Every day about twenty-six Americans on the average are killed by drunk drivers. Heavy drinking used to be an acceptable part of the American masculine image, but the drunken killer has recently caused so many tragedies that the public is no longer tolerant.

Twenty states in the United States have raised the legal drinking age to 21, reversing a trend of 1960s to reduce it to 18. After New Jersey lowered it to 18, the number of people killed by 18- to 20-year-old drivers doubled, so the state recently upped it back to 21. Some states are also punishing bars for serving customers too many drinks. As the casualties continue to occur daily, some Americans are even beginning to suggest a national prohibition on alcohol. Reformers, however, think that legal prohibition and raising the drinking age will have little effect unless accompanied by educational programs to help young people develop responsible attitudes towards drinking.
