Forewords

With the development of economic globalization and the enhancement of comprehensive strength, the economic connection of China with other countries and areas is getting closer and closer. In 2014, the total value of import and export of China reached 26.43 trillion RMB, direct investment actually made in China by foreign investors reached 119.6 billion USD, and direct investment made in foreign countries and areas by Chinese investors reached 102.9 billion USD. All these have made China the most active and important participant in world economy. With such a circumstance, it is beyond doubt that the demand for foreign-related legal talents will increase considerably.

To foster qualified foreign-related legal talents, it is essential that foreign-related legal courses be taught in foreign languages. As early as in 2001, the Ministry of Education required that 5 – 10 percent of courses in major of finance, law and the like, should be taught in English or other foreign languages. Since then, many law schools in China offered some bilingual or English legal courses. In our teaching practice, we have perceived the unsuitability of using original English textbooks in Chinese classes. So we have long been planning to edit and publish our own English textbooks on international or foreign-related legal subjects, and this textbook is the first one.

Arbitration is the best and most frequently used method to resolve international commercial disputes, and international commercial arbitration is one of the most internationalized legal branches. In the past two decades, many jurisdictions reformed their arbitration legislation based upon the Model Law, which reflects the modern trend of the practice of international commercial arbitration, and in accordance with the requirements of the New York Convention. This textbook generalizes the common practices of modern international commercial arbitration, with references to the New York Convention, the Model Law, the newest arbitration legislation of major jurisdictions, the newest arbitration rules of leading international arbitration institutions and many up-dated academic literatures, and especially with Chinese laws and practice on foreign-related arbitration being compared.

To cater for various demands of different schools and students at different levels, this textbook focuses on introducing the fundamental legal rules and general practice of international commercial arbitration, instead of discussing pure theoretical issues. The structure of this textbook is simplified and thus very concise, but is logically complete, covering every aspect of international commercial arbitration, including arbitration agreements, arbitrators and arbitral tribunals, arbitral proceedings, arbitral awards, challenge to arbitral awards, and recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards. This textbook can, therefore, be used either in law schools which are the training bases of outstanding foreign-related legal talents approved by the Ministry of Education or in other law schools, either for undergraduate students or for postgraduate students.

Because of limitation of the ability and proficiency of the authors, there must be some mistakes and errors in this textbook. We sincerely hope that the users and readers would be generous enough to feedback us with any comments, suggestions and corrections, which will be highly appreciated.

Chapter I An Overview of International Commercial Arbitration

中文导读：

本章为国际商事仲裁概述，首先论述了仲裁的含义与特征，介绍了关于仲裁的法律性质的不同理论，以及仲裁的不同分类；然后重点阐述了什么是国际商事仲裁和国际商事仲裁的优点；最后介绍了国际商事仲裁的法律渊源和国内外主要的常设国际商事仲裁机构。

Section 1 Arbitration in General

Arbitration is a private dispute resolution whereby the parties reach to an agreement to submit their dispute to a private and neutral third party and that third party makes final decisions binding upon all parties concerned. In accordance with different criteria, arbitration can be either institutional or ad hoc, either domestic or international.

1. Definition and features of arbitration

1.1 Definition of arbitration

Because of its neutrality and world-wide enforceability of the award,^[1] arbitration has become the most frequently used method and a highly institutionalized mechanism to resolve international commercial disputes. Some commentators even repute arbitration as the only best method to resolve international commercial disputes. However, most national arbitration laws and all international arbitration conventions do not give a clear definition of arbitration.

Shorter Oxford English Dictionary defines arbitration as “the settlement of a question at issue by one to whom the parties agree to refer their claims in order to obtain an equitable decision.” Wikipedia describes arbitration as “a form of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), a technique for the resolution of disputes outside the courts, where the parties to a dispute refer it to one or more persons (the ‘arbitrators’ or ‘arbitral tribunal’), by whose decision (the ‘award’) they agree to be bound.”

Numerous scholars have sought to define what arbitration is. For examples, Rene David defines arbitration as “a device whereby the settlement of a question, which is of interest for two or more persons, is entrusted to one or more other persons (the arbitrator or arbitrators) who derive their powers from a private agreement, not from the authorities of a state, and who are to proceed and decide the case on the basis of such an agreement.”^[1] According to Alan Redfern and Martin Hunter, arbitration is “Parties who are in dispute agree to submit their disagreement to a person whose expertise or judgment they trust. They each put their respective cases to this person (this private individual, this arbitrator) who listens, considers the facts and the arguments, and then makes a decision.”^[2]

In brief words, arbitration may be defined as a private dispute resolution whereby the parties, before or after the arising of a dispute, reach to an agreement to submit the dispute to a private and neutral third party, who hears the case and makes final decisions binding upon all parties to the dispute.

1.2 Features of arbitration

Compared with litigation in national courts and any other dispute resolutions, arbitration has the following characteristics:

(1) Arbitration is an alternative dispute resolution (ADR). Arbitration is alternative to litigation in national courts. The most obvious forum for all disputes is national court. National courts are sponsored and maintained by the state to provide dispute settlement service for the public, either foreigners or nationals. It is a manifestation of state power and the responsibility of the state to ensure that courts exist, qualified judges are appointed and there are procedural rules to regulate the basis of jurisdiction and the conduct of cases before the court. If the parties have not reached to an agreement to resolve their dispute through other means, the dispute must be submitted to a relevant national court. But if the parties do not want to go to national courts, they can reach to an arbitration agreement. If there exists a valid arbitration agreement between the parties, the dispute shall be submitted to arbitration, and any national court shall have no jurisdiction.

(2) Arbitration is a creature of party autonomy. The principal characteristic of arbitration is that it is chosen by the parties, and the parties have ultimate control over the whole process of arbitration. The parties have the ultimate power to determine the form,
