

Genotype-by-Environment Interactions and Sexual Selection

Edited by John Hunt and David J. Hosken

WILEY Blackwell

Q12.
1

Genotype-by-Environment Interactions and Sexual Selection

---

Edited by

John Hunt and David Hosken

*Centre for Ecology & Conservation
University of Exeter, Cornwall Campus, UK*

WILEY Blackwell

This edition first published 2014 © 2014 by John Wiley & Sons, Ltd

Registered office: John Wiley & Sons, Ltd, The Atrium, Southern Gate, Chichester, West Sussex, PO19 8SQ, UK

Editorial offices: 9600 Garsington Road, Oxford, OX4 2DQ, UK
The Atrium, Southern Gate, Chichester, West Sussex, PO19 8SQ, UK
111 River Street, Hoboken, NJ 07030-5774, USA

For details of our global editorial offices, for customer services and for information about how to apply for permission to reuse the copyright material in this book please see our website at www.wiley.com/wiley-blackwell.

The right of the author to be identified as the author of this work has been asserted in accordance with the UK Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, except as permitted by the UK Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, without the prior permission of the publisher.

Designations used by companies to distinguish their products are often claimed as trademarks. All brand names and product names used in this book are trade names, service marks, trademarks or registered trademarks of their respective owners. The publisher is not associated with any product or vendor mentioned in this book.

Limit of Liability/Disclaimer of Warranty: While the publisher and author(s) have used their best efforts in preparing this book, they make no representations or warranties with respect to the accuracy or completeness of the contents of this book and specifically disclaim any implied warranties of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose. It is sold on the understanding that the publisher is not engaged in rendering professional services and neither the publisher nor the author shall be liable for damages arising herefrom. If professional advice or other expert assistance is required, the services of a competent professional should be sought.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Genotype-by-environment interactions and sexual selection / edited by John Hunt and David Hosken.

pages cm

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-0-470-67179-5 (cloth)

1. Sexual selection in animals. 2. Genotype-environment interaction. I. Hunt, John, 1974-II. Hosken, David J.

QL761.G46 2014

591.56'2-dc23

2014015268

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

Wiley also publishes its books in a variety of electronic formats. Some content that appears in print may not be available in electronic books.

Cover image: A female (top) and male (bottom) decorated cricket (Gryllodes sigillatus) mating. Photograph courtesy of David Funk.

Typeset in 10.5/12pt Sabon by Laserwords Private Limited, Chennai, India.
Printed and bound in Singapore by Markono Print Media Pte Ltd.

Genotype-by-Environment Interactions and Sexual Selection

Dedication – To our teachers at the Zoology Department, University of Western Australia.

List of Contributors

---

- Lawrence Bellamy, Department of Genetics, Evolution and Environment, University College, UK. E-mail: l.bellamy@ucl.ac.uk
- Kevin Fowler, Department of Genetics, Evolution and Environment, University College London, UK. E-mail: k.fowler@ucl.ac.uk
- Thomas Getty, Department of Zoology & Kellogg Biological Station, Michigan State University, USA. E-mail: getty@msu.edu
- Michael D. Greenfield, Institut de recherche sur la biologie de l'insecte, CNRS UMR 7261, Université François Rabelais de Tours, France. E-mail: michael.greenfield@univ-tours.fr
- Luke Holman, Centre of Excellence in Biological Interactions, Division of Ecology, Evolution & Genetics, Research School of Biology, Australian National University, Australia. E-mail: luke.holman@anu.edu.au
- David Hosken, Centre for Ecology and Conservation, College of Life and Environmental Sciences, University of Exeter, UK. E-mail: D.J.Hosken@exeter.ac.uk
- John Hunt, Centre for Ecology and Conservation, College of Life and Environmental Sciences, University of Exeter, UK. E-mail: J.Hunt@exeter.ac.uk
- Fiona C. Ingleby, Centre for Ecology and Conservation, College of Life and Environmental Sciences, University of Exeter, UK. E-mail: fiona.ingleby@gmail.com
- Hanna Kokko, Centre of Excellence in Biological Interactions, Division of Ecology, Evolution & Genetics, Research School of Biology, Australian National University, Australia. E-mail: hanna.kokko@anu.edu.au
- Gita R. Kolluru, Biological Sciences Department, California Polytechnic State University, USA. E-mail: gkolluru@calpoly.edu
- Esa Koskela, Department of Biological and Environmental Science, University of Jyväskylä, Finland. E-mail: esa.m.koskela@jyu.fi
- Judith E. Mank, Department of Genetics, Evolution and Environment, University College London, UK. E-mail: Judith.Mank@ucl.ac.uk
- Tapio Mappes, Department of Biological and Environmental Science, University of Jyväskylä, Finland. E-mail: tapio.mappes@jyu.fi

- Suzanne C. Mills, Department of Biological and Environmental Science, University of Jyväskylä, Finland and Laboratoire d'Excellence "CORAIL", USR 3278, CRIOBE, CNRS-EPHE-UPVD, France. E-mail: suzanne.mills@univ-perp.fr
- Mikael Mokkonen, Department of Biological and Environmental Science, University of Jyväskylä, Finland and Department of Biological Sciences, Simon Fraser University, Canada. E-mail: mikael.p.mokkonen@jyu.fi
- Jennifer C. Perry, Department of Zoology, Edward Grey Institute, University of Oxford, UK. E-mail: Jennifer.Perry@zoo.ox.ac.uk
- Andrew Pomiankowski, Department of Genetics, Evolution and Environment, University College London, UK and CoMPLEX, University College London, UK. E-mail: ucbhpom@ucl.ac.uk
- Anna Qvarnström, Animal Ecology/Department of Ecology and Evolution, Uppsala University, Sweden. E-mail: anna.qvarnstrom@ebc.uu.se
- Matthew R. Robinson, Queensland Brain Institute, University of Queensland, St. Lucia, Brisbane, Australia. E-mail: m.robinson11@uq.edu.au
- Derek A. Roff, Department of Biology, University of California, USA. E-mail: derek.roff@ucr.edu
- Nick J. Royle, Centre for Ecology and Conservation, College of Life and Environmental Sciences, University of Exeter, UK. E-mail: N.J.Royle@exeter.ac.uk
- Scott K. Sakaluk, Behaviour, Ecology, Evolution & Systematics Section, School of Biological Sciences, Illinois State University, USA. E-mail: sksakal@ilstu.edu
- Michael J. Wade, Department of Biology, Indiana University, USA. E-mail: mjwade@indiana.edu
- Carie Weddle, Behaviour, Ecology, Evolution & Systematics Section, School of Biological Sciences, Illinois State University, USA. E-mail: cbweddl@ilstu.edu
- Alastair J. Wilson, Centre for Ecology and Conservation, College of Life and Environmental Sciences, University of Exeter, UK. E-mail: A.Wilson@exeter.ac.uk
- Jason B. Wolf, Department of Biology and Biochemistry, University of Bath, UK. E-mail: jason@evolutionarygenetics.org

Preface

---

Much of the early history of evolutionary genetics was focused on understanding the relative contribution of genes and the environment to observed levels of phenotypic variation. Chief in this pursuit was Ronald A. Fisher who, amongst his many achievements, developed a statistical framework for partitioning these sources of phenotypic variance in a population. Underlying this framework was the idea that genetic and environmental sources of phenotypic variance in a population could be summed as long as they act independently, providing a simple method to statistically partition the relative effects of these sources of variation in phenotype. This logic is easy to follow if (as Fisher believed) the environment has negligible effects on phenotype and is distributed at random across individuals (and genotypes) in the population. Other researchers at the time (led most notably by Lancelot T. Hogben), however, argued that this framework under-estimated the importance of the environment and also missed a third and important source of phenotypic variation: that which arises from the combination of a particular genetic constitution with a particular kind of environment. Nowadays, we refer to this differential response of genotypes to environmental variation as genotype-by-environment interactions (GEIs) and know that this source of phenotypic variance is almost ubiquitous in most animal and plant populations.

Unfortunately, most researchers in the early part of the twentieth century viewed GEIs as an annoying departure from Fisher's additive framework. This view was particularly evident in agricultural genetics where the presence of GEIs often meant that a good genotype (or crop variety) in one environment may perform poorly in another environment. In such instances, the predictive power of genotypes across environments is greatly reduced, which has obvious consequences for the efficiency of selective breeding programs. It was not until the mid-1980s, however, that the explicit role of GEIs in the evolutionary process was considered. GEIs are now known to play a key role in a number of different evolutionary processes including the maintenance of genetic variation, driving population divergence and speciation, as well as directing the evolutionary response of phenotypes to changing environments.

Over the last decade or so, researchers have started examining the more specific role of GEIs in sexual selection. There is little question that females preferentially mate with some males in the population but exactly why females are choosing these males is more debatable. “Good genes” models of sexual selection have featured prominently in this debate and assume that females prefer males of high genetic quality to gain genetic benefits for their offspring via enhanced viability. The problem with this logic, however, is that a female can only assess a male’s phenotype not his genotype. In an ideal world where a male’s phenotype maps perfectly onto his genotype, preferentially mating with a male of high genetic quality should be relatively easy for a female to achieve: choose the male with the most elaborate sexual trait or most vigorous sexual display that reliably reflects his underlying genetic quality. However, if the expression of these sexual traits or displays is heavily influenced by GEIs and males disperse freely between environments, the genotype-phenotype map will be considerably weakened making it difficult (if not impossible) for females to assess male genetic quality based on these traits. The operation of sexual selection will be further complicated if GEIs also exist for female mate choice, as appears the case for the few systems where this has been examined. Collectively, this suggests that “good genes” arguments are likely to be overly simplistic when GEIs are present and may go some way to explaining why their effects (although taxonomically widespread) appear to be relatively minor.

Although there is currently an explosion of theoretical and empirical research on the role of GEIs in sexual selection, no single volume has attempted to compile this work or highlight the key findings in this area. Our goal was therefore to produce a volume that provides a clear overview of the importance of GEIs to sexual selection. As many of the leading researchers working on this topic have contributed to this volume, we hope that it will serve as both a primer on the role of GEIs in sexual selection and a guide to help direct future research. We believe this book will be of broad interest to established researchers working on sexual selection, as well as undergraduate and postgraduate students starting their research careers.

We have divided the book into three main sections that we believe cover the key developments on the role of GEIs in sexual selection. Part 1 lays the theoretical foundations outlining the importance of GEIs for sexual selection. Mike Wade (Chapter 1) starts with a general overview of the many problems with “good-genes” models of sexual selection when male genetic quality is correctly viewed as a complex trait that is influenced by GEIs, interactions between genes, as well as genes provided by the social environment. Next, Thomas Getty (Chapter 2) examines the role of uncertainty and incomplete information transfer using a simple optimality model that focusses on female choosiness when searching for mates is costly and males of different genotypes are only partially discriminable (due to crossover GEIs and dispersal between environments). Following a similar theme, Luke Holman and Hanna Kokko (Chapter 3) use a genetically explicit individual-based simulation to examine how dispersal, signal reliability and spatial variation affect the evolution of female mate choice for locally adapted genes. Importantly, this simulation does not vary the form of GEIs (whether there is crossover or no crossover) directly. Rather dispersal is varied across a continuous distribution of environments with locally varying phenotypic optima so that dispersing individuals experience weaker correspondence between environmental conditions at their natal and their breeding sites the further they disperse. They then extend this logic to ask how spatial variation creates differences in local adaptation, and whether female choice can persist when females encounter males from diverse natal environments. Finally, building on some of the key ideas introduced by Mike Wade (Chapter 1), Jason Wolf, Nick Royle, and John Hunt (Chapter 4) use a series of quantitative genetic models to examine how genotype by social environment interactions (GSEIs) influence the operation of sexual selection, when the social environment contains genes. They also provide a guide to measuring GSEIs, as well as an overview of empirical studies measuring this process within the context of sexual selection.

A necessary (and critical) first step for empiricists examining the role of GEIs in sexual selection is to formally demonstrate their existence and quantify their strength. Section 2 therefore provides an overview of the experimental and statistical approaches that can be used to quantify GEIs. Derek Roff and Alastair Wilson (Chapter 5) start by providing an overview of the breeding and statistical methods used to estimate GEIs in laboratory studies where the pedigree structure of the organism being studied is under the control of the experimenter. Matthew Robinson and Anna Qvarnström (Chapter 6) then extend this framework by providing an overview of the numerous of statistical approaches that can be used to quantify GEIs in natural populations when pedigree structure is not controlled by the experimenter. Finally, Jennifer Perry and Judith Mank (Chapter 7) review the application of gene expression approaches to understanding GEIs in sexually selected traits. They place particular emphasis on recent transcriptomic methods and outline some of the methodological concerns with this approach, as well as ways to optimize experimental designs to detect transcriptome by environment interactions (TEIs).

In Part 3 we provide an overview of empirical studies examining the role of GEIs in sexual selection. To start, Michael Greenfield (Chapter 8) provides an overview of his research on GEIs and sexual selection in the lesser waxmoth (Achroia grisella). This chapter represents the culmination of over a decade worth of empirical research on the topic and therefore represents one of the best studied systems on how GEIs influence the operation of sexual selection. Next Lawrence Bellamy, Kevin Fowler, and Andrew Pomiankowski (Chapter 9) discuss the potential use of inbreeding to assess GEIs in sexual traits. Inbreeding offers a moderately simple but powerful way to alter the genetic quality of individuals and demonstrating inbreeding by environment interactions (IEIs) is therefore functionally equivalent to GEIs. Reviewing the literature, they then show that sexual traits show clear inbreeding depression but this does not appear any greater than for nonsexual traits and there is little evidence suggesting that inbreeding reveals GEIs. This undoubtedly reflects the current lack of empirical tests. Suzanne Mills, Mikael Mokkonen, Esa Koskela, and Tapio Mappes (Chapter 10) provide an overview of their research on GEIs and signal reliability in bank voles (Myodes glareolus). A variety of male signals exhibit GEIs in this species, challenging signal reliability, and potentially disrupting the covariance between male signal and female preference. Mills and colleagues discuss a number of mechanisms that may help mitigate these problems, including parallel reaction norms for male signal and female preference, assortative dispersal and sexual antagonism. Fiona Ingleby, David Hosken, and John Hunt (Chapter 11) provide an overview of plasticity and GEIs for cuticular hydrocarbons (CHCs) expression in Drosophila – a chemical signal that is known to be under strong sexual selection in many Drosophila species. They cover the diversity of biotic and abiotic environments influencing CHC expression in Drosophila, as well as providing a summary of studies demonstrating GEIs within the context of sexual selection and the likely consequences for CHC evolution in this important genus. Gita Kolluru (Chapter 12) reviews the evidence for GEIs in the sexual traits of guppies (Peocilia reticulata). Although there is considerable evidence to suggest that male sexual traits in guppies exhibit substantial genetic variation and plastic responses to the environment, and individuals frequently encounter varying environmental conditions, surprisingly few studies have convincingly demonstrate GEIs for sexual traits in this species. To conclude this section, Scott Sakaluk, Carie Weddle, and John Hunt (Chapter 13) examine the role that GEIs and signal reliability play in chemosensory self-referencing and the maintenance of polyandry in decorated crickets, Gryllodes sigillatus. Female crickets in this species mark their male partner with CHCs during mating and use this signal to avoid re-mating with them in favor of a novel male. Thus, there is strong selection for CHCs to reliably signal individual identity in females and the lack of substantial GEIs facilitates this process. No such signaling constraints are likely to exist for males, where strong GEIs for CHCs exist.

Finally, this volume would not have been possible without the help and guidance of our friends, colleagues and mentors. We would like to thank our teachers at the Department of Zoology (University of Western Australia) for sparking our early interest in evolutionary biology, especially sexual selection and genetics. We also thank our friends and colleagues (Rob Brooks, Steve Chenoweth, Mark Blows, Michael Jennions, Luc Bussiere, Jason Wolf, Sasha Dall, Mike Wade, Allen Moore, and Alastair Wilson) for many insightful discussions over the years that have shaped the way we think about GEIs and their consequences for the operation of sexual selection. We are greatly indebted to all of the chapter authors for their excellent contributions and for providing critical feedback on other book chapters. Their hard work and willingness to accommodate changes to their own chapters made the publication of this book a much less painful task. Last but not least, we thank our families for their continued support and patience.

John Hunt and David Hosken
Cornwall, United Kingdom, October 2013

About the Companion Website

---

This book is accompanied by a companion website:

www.wiley.com/go/hunt/genotype

This website includes:

- Powerpoints of all figures from the book for downloading
- PDFs of tables from the book

Contents

---

List of Contributors	xiii
Preface	xv
About the Companion Website	xix
Part I INTRODUCTION AND THEORETICAL CONCEPTS	1
1 Genotype-by-Environment Interactions and Sexual Selection: Female Choice in a Complex World	3
Michael J. Wade
1.1 Introduction	3
1.2 Classical female cho	4
1.3 The instability of “good genes” when male quality is a complex trait	6
1.3.1 Additive effects of genes on genotypic value	8
1.3.2 Genotype-by-environment interaction	9
1.3.3 Gene-by-gene interaction	12
1.3.4 Indirect genetic effects sensu quantitative genetics	13
1.4 Discussion	16
Acknowledgments	17
References	17
2 GEIs when Information Transfer is Uncertain or Incomplete	19
Thomas Getty
2.1 Introduction	19
2.2 Lewontin’s “very annoying conclusions”	21
2.3 Ignorance, uncertainty, and information	21
2.4 Information and fitness	22

2.5	Bayesian Statistical Decision Theory	23
2.6	Discrimination and selection: the signal detection perspective	24
2.7	Search, discrimination, and mate choice by female pied flycatchers	25
2.8	Optimal search and the marginal value of additional information	29
2.9	Biological signaling theory	31
2.10	GEIs in condition, signals, and preferences	32
2.11	Conclusions	37
	References	38
3	Local Adaptation and the Evolution of Female Choice	41
	Luke Holman and Hanna Kokko
3.1	Introduction	41
3.2	The Jekyll and Hyde nature of GEIs	43
3.3	The model	46
3.3.1	Overview	46
3.3.2	Initialization phase	46
3.3.3	Dispersal	49
3.3.4	Determination of condition and viability selection	49
3.3.5	Breeding	49
3.3.6	Mutation	50
3.4	Less local adaptation, more female choice!	51
3.5	Can we generalize?	52
3.6	GEIs often maintain costly choice in a suitably variable world	53
3.7	Insights from the model	55
3.8	Prospects for empirical work	56
3.9	Prospects for theoretical work	57
3.10	Conclusions	59
	References	59
4	Genotype-by-Environment Interactions when the Social Environment Contains Genes	63
	Jason B. Wolf, Nick J. Royle, and John Hunt
4.1	Introduction	63
4.2	Modeling genotype-by-social environment interactions	64
4.2.1	A simple GEI model when the environment is abiotic	65
4.2.2	A simple model for gene interactions	69
4.2.3	A simple GSEI model	73
4.2.4	Summary	78
4.3	Measuring genotype by social environment interactions	79
4.4	Empirical evidence for genotype by social environment interactions	84
4.5	Future directions	91

Acknowledgments	94
References	94

Part II PRACTICAL ISSUES FOR MEASURING GEIs 99

5 Quantifying Genotype-by-Environment Interactions in Laboratory Systems 101

Derek A. Roff and Alastair J. Wilson

5.1	Introduction	101
5.2	Two perspectives on phenotypic plasticity	102
5.2.1	The character state approach	102
5.2.2	Norm of reaction approach	103
5.3	Breeding designs to detect and estimate $G \times E$	105
5.3.1	Common garden	105
5.3.2	Clones	106
5.3.3	Inbred lines	107
5.3.4	Isofemale lines	108
5.3.5	Conventional breeding designs	108
5.3.6	"Unconventional" pedigree designs	109
5.3.7	Selection experiments	109
5.4	Statistical methodologies	109
5.4.1	Mixed-model analysis of variance	110
5.4.2	Linear mixed effect model	111
5.4.3	The animal model	113
5.4.4	Individually fitted functions	115
5.4.5	Random regression models	119
5.4.6	Random regression models as covariance functions	120
5.4.7	Multivariate models	121
5.5	Worked examples	122
5.5.1	Example 1	122
5.5.2	Example 2	126
5.5.3	Example 3	130
5.6	Recommendations	133
	Acknowledgments	134
	References	134

6 Influence of the Environment on the Genetic Architecture of Traits Involved in Sexual Selection within Wild Populations 137

Matthew R. Robinson and Anna Qvarnström

6.1	Introduction	137
6.2	Application of sexual selection theory to wild populations	139
6.2.1	Identifying the key parameters	139
6.2.2	Acquisition and allocation determine the form of GEI	140

6.2.3	The genetic basis of female mate choice may show GEI	143
6.2.4	Fitness associations may be environmentally dependent	144
6.2.5	Covariance between the sexes	146
6.3	Methods for examining GEI in wild populations	146
6.3.1	Identifying the relevant environmental variables	147
6.3.2	The “animal” model	148
6.3.3	Character-state approach	148
6.3.4	Factor analytic models	150
6.3.5	Autoregressive functions	151
6.3.6	Reaction norm models: random regressions	151
6.3.7	Estimating environmental sensitivity as an alternative	155
6.3.8	Estimating genetic covariance across environments	156
6.3.9	Estimating covariance with fitness across environments	157
6.4	Worked examples of the analysis methods	158
6.5	Summary	164
	References	165

7	From Genotype <math>\times</math> Environment to Transcriptome <math>\times</math> Environment: Identifying and Understanding Environmental Influences in the Gene Expression Underlying Sexually Selected Traits	169
	Jennifer C. Perry and Judith E. Mank
7.1	Introduction	169
7.2	Gene expression variation allows a static genome to respond to varying environments	170
7.3	From GEIs to TEIs in sexually selected traits	172
7.4	Can we safely ignore the genomic basis of phenotypes?	174
7.5	The first step is identifying the transcriptomic basis of sexually selected traits	175
7.6	A note on gene expression and sexually selected behavior	178
7.7	The next step is to understand how gene expression responds to environmental influences	179
7.8	A few notes on technology and experimental design	180
7.9	Conclusion	182
	Acknowledgments	183
	References	183

Part III	EMPIRICAL STUDIES ON GEIs AND SEXUAL SELECTION	189
8	Phenotypic Plasticity and Genotype <math>\times</math> Environment Interactions in Animal Communication	191
	Michael D. Greenfield
8.1	Introduction	191
8.1.1	GEI and the lek paradox	193
8.1.2	GEI and signal (un)reliability	194
8.1.3	Achroia grisella : a model species for sexual selection studies	195
8.2	Natural history and acoustic communication	196
8.3	Quantitative genetics of song and preference	199
8.3.1	Do genetic tradeoffs maintain $V_A$ for song traits?	199
8.3.2	GEI, ecological crossover, and the maintenance of $V_A$	200
8.4	On the role of GEI in natural populations	203
8.4.1	Indirect genetic effects (IGEs)	203
8.4.2	Reaction norm diversity and ecological crossover	203
8.4.3	Does environmental heterogeneity help to sustain $V_A$ ?	204
8.4.4	Synopsis	205
8.5	Are male songs reliable signals?	206
8.6	Prognosis	207
	Acknowledgments	208
	References	208
9	The Use of Inbreeding to Assess the Genetic Component of Condition Underlying GEIs in Sexual Traits	213
	Lawrence Bellamy, Kevin Fowler, and Andrew Pomiankowski
9.1	Introduction	213
9.2	Sexual traits and genetic condition	214
9.3	Studies of environmental variation	215
9.4	Studies of genetic variation	216
9.5	The use of inbreeding to infer the genetics of condition-dependent traits	217
9.6	Designing inbreeding experiments	218
9.6.1	Choice of control traits	218
9.6.2	Controlling for body size covariation	220
9.6.3	Outbred controls	220
9.6.4	Experimental scale	221
9.6.5	GEI	221