

WOMEN and POWER in POSTCONFLICT AFRICA

Aili Mari Tripp

Women and Power in Postconflict Africa

By

AILI MARI TRIPP

University of Wisconsin–Madison

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

32 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10013-2473, USA

Cambridge University Press is part of the University of Cambridge.

It furthers the University's mission by disseminating knowledge in the pursuit of education, learning, and research at the highest international levels of excellence.

www.cambridge.org
Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9781107535879

© Aili Tripp 2015

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2015

Printed in the United Kingdom by Clays, St Ives plc

A catalog record for this publication is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Tripp, Aili Mari, author.

Women and power in post-conflict Africa / by Aili Mari Tripp.

pages cm – (Cambridge studies in gender and politics)

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-1-107-11557-6 (Hardcover : alk. paper)

1. Women–Political activity–Africa. 2. Women's rights–Africa. 3. Women's rights–Uganda–Case studies. 4. Women's rights–Liberia–Case studies. 5. Women's rights–Angola–Case studies. 6. Africa–Politics and government–21st century. I. Title. II. Series: Cambridge studies in gender and politics.

HQ1236.5.A35T75 2015

305.42096–dc23 2015027392

ISBN 978-1-107-11557-6 Hardback

ISBN 978-1-107-53587-9 Paperback

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party Internet Web sites referred to in this publication, and does not guarantee that any content on such Web sites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

Women and Power in Postconflict Africa

The book explains an unexpected consequence of the decrease in conflict in Africa after the 1990s. Analysis of cross-national data and in-depth comparisons of case studies of Uganda, Liberia, and Angola show that postconflict countries have significantly higher rates of women's political representation in legislatures and government compared with countries that have not undergone major conflict. They have also passed more legislative reforms and made more constitutional changes relating to women's rights. The study explains how and why these patterns emerged, tying these outcomes to the conjuncture of the rise of women's movements, changes in international women's rights norms, and, most importantly, to gender disruptions that occur during war. This book will help scholars, students, women's rights activists, international donors, policy makers, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and others better understand some of the circumstances that are most conducive to women's rights reform today.

Aili Mari Tripp is Professor of Political Science and Gender and Women's Studies at the University of Wisconsin–Madison. She is the author of several award-winning books, including Museveni's Uganda: Paradoxes of Power in a Hybrid Regime (2010) and Women and Politics in Uganda (2000). She is coauthor of African Women's Movements: Transforming Political Landscapes (2009). Professor Tripp is the coeditor of the book series Women in Africa and the Diaspora. She has served as president of the African Studies Association and as vice president of the American Political Science Association.

Cambridge Studies in Gender and Politics

CAMBRIDGE STUDIES IN GENDER AND POLITICS (CSGP) publishes empirical and theoretical research on gender and politics. The Series advances work that addresses key theoretical, normative, and empirical puzzles concerning sex and gender and their mutual impacts, constructions, and consequences regarding the political, comprehensively understood.

General Editors:

Karen Beckwith (Lead)
Case Western Reserve University

Lisa Baldez
Dartmouth College

Christina Wolbrecht
University of Notre Dame

Editorial Advisory Board:

Nancy Burns
University of Michigan

Matthew Evangelista
Cornell University

Nancy Hirschmann
University of Pennsylvania

Sarah Song
University of California at Berkeley

Ann Towns
University of Gothenburg

Aili Mari Tripp
University of Wisconsin at Madison

Georgina Waylen
University of Manchester

Advance Praise for Women and Power in Postconflict Africa

"In this book Aili Mari Tripp yet again sets the standard for excellence in comparative feminist scholarship. Through rigorous research, she carefully unpacks and explains why some countries emerging from conflict are able to transform the gender order while others are not. Her careful analysis captures the causal mechanisms that together produce change – gender disruptions, women's movements activism and international norms. As is usual with her pioneering work, her skillful illumination of gender change processes in Africa will provide the template for other scholars seeking to explain the conditions under which transformation is possible in other regions of the world. The book is a must-read for anyone interested in Africa, in post-conflict transitions, and in gender transformation."

Louise Chappell,
University of New South Wales

To three remarkable men:

*My father, Lloyd Swantz; my husband, Warren Tripp;
and my son, Lloyd Tripp*

Map of Africa

FIGURE 0.1 Credit: Eva Swantz

Acronyms

AAD	Acção Angolana para o Desenvolvimento
ADRA	Action for Rural Development and the Environment (Angola)/Acção para o Desenvolvimento Rural e Ambiente
AIDS	acquired immune deficiency syndrome
AFL	Armed Forces of Liberia
AFELL	Association of Female Lawyers of Liberia
AU	African Union
CEDAW	Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women
CIDA	Canadian International Development Agency
COEIPA	Comité Inter-Eclesiástico para a Paz em Angola
CPA	comprehensive peace agreement
CSOs	civil society organizations
DANIDA	Danish International Development Agency
DFID	Department for International Cooperation (UK)
DPKO	Department of Peacekeeping Operations
DRC	Democratic Republic of Congo
ECCAS	Economic Community of Central African States
ECOMOG	Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group
ECOWAS	Economic Community of West African States
EMBs	electoral management bodies
FAA	Armed Forces of Angola/Forças Armadas de Angola
FAS	Femmes Africa Solidarité
FESA	Eduardo dos Santos Foundation/Fundação Eduardo dos Santos
FIDA	Women Lawyer's Association

FIND	Foundation for International Dignity (Liberia)
FLEC	Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda
FNLA	National Liberation Front of Angola/Frente Nacional de Libertação de Angola
FONGA	Forum of the Angolan Non-Governmental Organizations
FRELIMO	Mozambique Liberation Front/Frente de Libertação de Moçambique
GBV	gender-based violence
GDP	gross national product
GTZ	German Agency for Technical Cooperation
HIV	human immunodeficiency virus
ICD	Inter-Congolese Dialogue
ICTR	International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda
IDP	internally displaced person
IPU	Inter-Parliamentary Union
IGNU	Interim Government of National Unity (Liberia)
INPFL	Independent National Patriotic Front of Liberia
LGBT	Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgendered
LIMA	Independent League for Angolan Women/Comité Nacional da Liga da Mulher Angolana
LRA	Lord's Resistance Army (Uganda)
LURD	Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy
LWI	Liberian Women's Initiative
MARWOPNET	Mano River Women Peace Network
MENA	Middle East and North Africa
MPD	Development Workshop run by Women Peace and Development/Movimento Angolano Mulheres Paz e Desenvolvimento
MODEL	Movement for Democracy in Liberia
MPLA	People's Movement for the Liberation of Angola/Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola
NAWOU	National Association of Women's Organisations in Uganda
NEC	National Electoral Commission (Liberia)
NCW	National Council of Women (Uganda)
NGO	nongovernmental organization
NORAD	Norwegian Agency for International Cooperation
NOVIB	Netherlands Organisation for International Development Cooperation
NPFL	National Patriotic Front of Liberia
NPP	National Patriotic Party (Liberia)
NRA	National Resistance Army (Uganda)
NRM	National Resistance Movement (Uganda)
OAU	Organisation of African Unity

ODA	overseas development assistance
OECD	Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development
OMA	Organization of the Women of Angola/Organização da Mulher de Angola
PRIO	Peace Research Institute Oslo
RCD	Rally for Congolese Democracy/Rassemblement Congolais pour la Démocratie
RENAMO	Mozambican National Resistance/Resistência Nacional Moçambicana
SACC	South African Council of Churches
SADC	Southern African Development Community
SCA	Angolan Civic Association/Sociedade Civil Angolana
SIDA	Swedish International Development Cooperation Agency
SIPRI	Stockholm International Peace Research Institute
SNV	Netherlands Development Organisation
UCW	Uganda Council of Women
ULIMO	United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy
ULIMO-K	United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy – Kromah faction
ULIMO-J	United Liberation Movement of Liberia for Democracy – Johnson faction
UN	United Nations
UNIFEM	United Nations Development Fund for Women
UNOMIL	United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia
UNMIL	United Nations Mission in Liberia
UNICEF	United Nations Children's Fund
UNITA	União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola/ National Union for the Total Independence of Angola
UNAIDS	United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS
UNDP	United Nations Development Programme
UNESCO	United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
UNHCR	United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
UPDF	Uganda People's Defense Forces
USAID	United States Agency for International Development
UNSC	United Nations Security Council
UNSCR	United Nations Security Council Resolution
UPC	Uganda People's Congress
WACC	Women and Children Affairs Coordination Unit (Liberia)
WDC	Ward Development Committees (Sierra Leone)
WIPNET	Women in Peacebuilding Network (Liberia)
WONGOSOL	Women Nongovernmental Organizations' Secretariat of Liberia
YWCA	Young Women's Christian Association

Acknowledgments

This book has been a remarkable journey on which I have met many extraordinary people who have assisted me in myriad ways through interviews, logistical support, feedback on drafts, serving as an audience to my ideas, guiding the book through the editorial process, and providing encouragement. A book like this cannot be written without the input of many hundreds of individuals. I thank them all – including those not mentioned by name – for their crucial assistance, both in large and small ways.

I could not have finished this book without the patience and support of my dear family, foremost my husband, Warren Tripp, as well as my daughter Leila and son Lloyd. My father, Lloyd Swantz, died just before the final manuscript was submitted, but in his own way he contributed to the book, as did my mother, Marja-Liisa Swantz, by giving me the courage to work in unfamiliar countries and be open to the many diverse people and experiences I encountered. My father lived a rich and full life as a result of his open heart to everyone he encountered.

A huge thank you goes to my sister, Eva Swantz, who is a graphic artist by profession, and drew the beautiful maps in this manuscript.

The friendship, encouragement, and input of Stanlie James, Florence Ebila, Grace Thomsen, Myra Marx Ferree, Sandra Barnes, Ulrike Anderssen, Päivi Takala, and Suzanne Moyer Baazet were especially important to me in this process.

Dionisio Lamba served as an intrepid translator and research assistant in Angola. Eveline Viegas, executive director of the Centro para Desenvolvimento e Parcerias de Angola in Luanda, provided incredible logistical assistance. I especially appreciated being able to come to the Centro for espresso coffee breaks in between interviews. In Liberia, the Hon. Amelia Ward, Hon. Florence Chenoweth, and Kevin Gorrator provided important assistance and insights. The late Marie-Ange Bunga conducted interviews for me in Kinshasa,

Democratic Republic of Congo, and enthusiastically engaged with some of the most brave and outstanding women leaders I have encountered. I am only sorry she was not able to see the project come to fruition because of her untimely death. In northern Uganda, Loyce Allen Asire provided critical support, both as a translator and research assistant. I am indebted to Marissa Moorman, Richard Strickland, Laura Singleton, Ladan Affi, Miriam Kelberg, Michael Burns, Sara Burnes, and Tasneem Amro for their help at crucial points in the process of writing and carrying out research.

Many have provided feedback on parts of this work over the years, and I owe them an enormous debt of gratitude. I can't thank Melanie Hughes enough for her persistence in collaborating with me and for believing in the importance of this project. She provided the conceptual and methodological rigor that went into the Social Forces article we coauthored that forms the quantitative basis for this book. I am also particularly indebted to Anne Marie-Goetz, Gretchen Bauer, Alice Kang, Rachel Ellett, and the two reviewers of the book who helped shape the final draft of the manuscript. Christine Scheidegger and Simanti Lahiri provided incisive comparative insights at key moments in the writing.

I would like to thank the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, DC, and the Center for Research on Gender and Women at the University of Wisconsin–Madison for providing me with fellowships. The University of Wisconsin System granted me a semester-long sabbatical to work on the book.

And finally, I am thrilled that this book is the first in the new book series, Cambridge Studies in Gender and Politics. I am especially grateful to the series editors, Karen Beckwith, Lisa Baldez, and Christina Wolbrecht, and to the Cambridge editor, Lewis Bateman, for helping shepherd the book to publication.

Preface

When I went to Uganda in 1992 to carry out research, I was interested in why Uganda, which had just come out of years of major conflict, had so many women in top government positions and why the country had the highest rates of representation of women in parliament in Africa at the time. What I did not know then – and could not have known – was that this was the beginning of a pattern that became especially evident after 2000: that post-conflict countries had higher rates of female representation in politics, and that they were making more women's rights reforms in their constitutions and legislation compared with non-postconflict countries. In my 2000 book, Women and Politics in Uganda, I attributed the changes to shifts in gender relations during the war, but primarily to the emergence of autonomous women's organizations, supported by international donors. Subsequently, fifteen other countries have emerged from major conflict, exhibiting similar patterns.

This book shows how the trends I noticed in Uganda in the early 1990s are now evident in other parts of Africa. It asks two main questions: What accounts for this somewhat curious by-product of war that has resulted in higher political leadership rates for women and more constitutional and legislative changes regarding women's rights in postconflict countries? This book also asks: How were postconflict countries able, in a relatively short span of time, to advance women's status in key areas and in some of the most challenging areas for women? They not only accomplished what the Nordic countries had done over the course of 100 years in increasing legislative representation, but, in some cases, exceeded their rates almost overnight. Moreover, the changes were not simply in the area of politics, they extended into multiple arenas.

What happened in Uganda and in many other postconflict states was a major shift in social and gender relations and in the gender regime, to borrow a concept developed by Raewyn Connell. The changes have been far from linear and are, in fact, quite uneven and messy. To activists in these countries, the changes have been all too slow and halting, but even the impatience with the slowness in the pace of change is an indication of the way in which expectations have been transformed. In nondemocratic countries, the changes are compromised by a lack of political rights and civil liberties. Taking a step back and looking at the big picture, however, these shifts represent a gender regime change in political institutions. This book focuses on transformations in the political arena, but to fully appreciate the magnitude of the changes, one has to look at the various dimensions of gender regime change, which include increased political power, but also involve women taking on new leadership roles in business, civil society, academia, religious institutions, and other institutions in which women had previously not been visible. Often attitudes toward women and women's leadership changed throughout society. In some countries the changes were more extensive than others, where sometimes one saw change only along a few dimensions.

I argue in this book that these patterns can be accounted for by (1) disruptions in gender relations that are unique to countries experiencing conflict. However, this explanation is insufficient because not all wars result in changes in women's status. Timing is critical. These shifts also occurred at a time when domestic and international norms were changing regarding women's rights. Thus, they took place in the context of (2) a rise in domestic women's mobilization, which was facilitated by an opening of political space, even if limited, and (3) changes in international gender norms along with pressures and encouragements primarily from United Nations agencies as well as other multilateral and bilateral donors. Although other countries may have experienced similar reforms, the postconflict trajectory sped up these developments.

It is an understatement to say that there is still a long way to go until equality is fully realized. Nevertheless, there has been too little attention paid to the accomplishments and too little credit given to the African women and men who brought about these changes. Too much of the credit has been given to donors and to other external actors, as well as to government leaders, who have their own agendas in all this. It is essential, however, to look at how these developments were tied to conjunctures of events that occurred at multiple levels.

Many scholars who focus on constitutional or legislative change, or the introduction of electoral quotas, look more narrowly at institutional change and what makes these institutions work for women. This study looks at what institutional change tells us about society and politics more broadly. In particular, I am interested in institutional change in periods of transition and the opportunity structures that facilitate or limit change.

The study also highlights the importance of looking at regional dynamics in the adoption of quotas and women's political representation. Although cross-national global studies are important in highlighting overall trends, there are regional specificities, such as a decline of many conflicts during the same time period in Africa, that would not describe contemporary Nordic or European dynamics, for example. By the same token, the fact that there are fewer new conflicts emerging and less reversal back into conflict in Africa is also positively influencing these trends because they require a certain amount of stability.

It goes without saying that the claims about the link between the decline of conflict and women's rights and representation are not in any way a normative prescription for or glorification of civil conflict and all its horrors, but rather an analysis of the opportunities that such ruptures may have presented to women's rights advocates.

The study builds on a cross-national quantitative and longitudinal study using latent growth curve analysis, which I carried out with Melanie Hughes (Hughes and Tripp 2015), that explains the factors influencing female representation in Africa. We found postconflict impacts to be highly significant and independent of other factors such as the introduction of quotas and proportional representation electoral systems when examined longitudinally. These postconflict patterns of women's new political leadership are particularly visible in countries that have had conflicts long in duration or high in intensity (high rates of death).

However, all of this requires explanation. Even the adoption of quotas by itself does not explain why governments introduced quotas in the first place any more than the decline of conflict explains why women were able to take advantage of this moment in certain countries to advance themselves. This book attempts to explain the causal mechanisms and opportunity structures that influenced gender regime change.

Part I provides an overview of the main arguments in the manuscript. Chapter 1 introduces the project and sets the stage by discussing the decline of conflict in Africa after the 1990s. It looks at several alternative arguments that potentially challenge the claims made in this book. It engages the literature on backlash to show that it is largely inapplicable to postconflict countries after the 1990s in Africa. It examines similar trends in earlier periods in history, namely the period after World War I, when women gained suffrage in many parts of the world. The chapter outlines the main arguments in the manuscript, including reasons for the distinct trajectory adopted by postconflict countries in bringing about changes in the gender regime in political institutions. This is followed by an explanation of the opportunity structures the women's movements were able to take advantage of to assert their interests, specifically peace negotiations and constitutional reform processes. At the heart of these changes is a transformation in elite configurations as older elites and coalitions are dislodged by new political institutions, making way for new leaders like women.

Chapter 2 outlines the causal mechanisms or explanations of how civil conflict influences women's rights policy adoption and some of the alternative arguments. The chapter then elaborates on the broad argument of the book, linking the rapid changes in postconflict women's rights reforms to the three aforementioned factors (disruptions in gender relations, domestic women's mobilization, and changes in international norms).

Part II of the book involves case studies of Uganda, Liberia, and Angola. Uganda, which is examined in Chapter 3, was the first country in Africa where postconflict influences on women's status described in this book became evident. They became apparent with the takeover of Yoweri Museveni and his National Resistance Movement (NRM) in 1986 after a five-year guerrilla war. The chapter details the three key factors described in Chapter 1 that help explain why postconflict countries have been more ready to promote women's rights and representation. The international factors became more salient after 1995, which was long after Uganda had already adopted women's rights in policy making, thus highlighting the importance of domestic actors, even if international considerations were beginning to become relevant.

Liberia, which is the subject of Chapter 4, is one of the more recent countries to emerge from conflict in Africa. The chapter discusses the evolution of the women's peace movement, which grew after the outbreak of conflict in 1989 and continued until the end of the second war in 2003. The peace movement was transformed into postconflict women's mobilization for political power and women's rights. As in the Uganda case study, the chapter systematically elaborates on all three factors and shows how they were present in the Liberian case.

The case of Angola (Chapter 5) is contrasted with the Ugandan, Liberian, and other African postconflict cases to show how the absence of key causal mechanisms made it less likely that Angola would adopt woman-friendly policies, in particular, the absence of an independent women's movement and the withdrawal of most donors after the war, especially those funding civil society. Also, the lack of democratization as a structural precondition, and the lack of a peace process in ending the war all served to limit the extent to which gender policy change could occur in Angola. The same political elites remained in power during and after the war as did the ruling party, similarly constraining gender regime change. The country's leaders did increase female political representation through the adoption of quotas, and they introduced a few woman-friendly policies, but not on the same scale or at the same pace found in other postconflict countries. Angola thus shares many of the same characteristics as other postconflict countries that did not see much significant change (e.g., Chad and Eritrea).

Part III of the book looks at the opportunity structures more closely, in particular peace agreements and constitutional reforms. Chapter 6 on peace agreements explains the importance of how the war ends, demonstrating that conflicts that ended with a comprehensive peace agreement provided significant opportunities for women activists to assert their demands for representation and set goals for a postconflict political order. They were not always able to gain a voice in the peace negotiations, but where they were successful, peace negotiations provided an important opportunity structure, influencing later constitutional and legislative outcomes and processes.

Chapter 7 looks at the stark difference between constitutions in countries coming out of conflict and countries that had not experienced major conflict,