Marx and Philosophy attempts to state Marx's thought on three general themes—the theory of knowledge, nationalism, and dialectics. The book combines textual-historical discussion with analysis and interpretation, that is to say it develops positions in light of more recent developments that were only implicit in Marx's own writings.

Lawrence Becker investigates a central and potent force in human life—the tendency to return good for good and evil for evil. He first describes a strategy for developing a moral theory of the virtues, and goes on to consider reciprocity in detail, arguing that it is a fundamental, deontic virtue that is characterized by extraordinary subtlety and complexity.

Routledge & Kegan Paul 1986

Professor Pojman deals with a constellation of problems related to believing and willing to believe. His main concern is with religious faith and belief, though his analysis is also of interest to epistemology and ethics. The first full-length treatise on religious belief that approaches the subject from the viewpoint of volitional activity, the book presents a rethinking of the way the will interacts with belief, enabling the reader to get fresh insight into the classical problem of religious belief and the will.

Professor Nakamura argues with great erudition that particular intellectual and social developments can be traced in all great cultures; that each culture deals with its problems in about the same order. Discussing, in their similarities and subtle differences, ideas from India, China, Japan and Europe, the author considers the controversy over universals and the nature of orthodoxy and heterodoxy by examining the local variations on such inclusive notions as the concept of good, the existence of an afterlife and the nature of moral responsibility.

This work has two closely interwoven aims: the exploration of the logical correlation (structures) of philosophical categories; and an attempt to work out the logic based on the system of categories obtained in this way. As a consequence of the effect of neopositivism, there is at present a considerable gap between philosophy and logic.

After the dissolution of the universalistic metaphysical systems, philosophy has attempted to understand the world of human concerns and existence on the basis of an analysis of finite human activities themselves. Two powerful paradigms emerged, the competition and dispute of which largely determine the contemporary situation not only of philosophy, but human sciences in general. The critical analysis of their respective premises and limits constitutes the subject matter of this book.

In this book, Fred Feldman presents and defends an integrated system of analyses of the main concepts of obligation - absolute and conditional. Among these are a neo-utilitarian concept of moral obligation, a concept of prudential obligation, and several concepts of group obligation. Each of these concepts is analyzed by appeal to some concept of goodness and some concept of possibility. Each normative concept thus serves as the basis for an interpretation of the idea that what we ought to do is always the best of our possibilities.

The themes of this book are motivated by a major question in cognitive science—can the representational and inferential processes of the language user be characterized in terms of abstract general principles that are knowledge-free or are they constrained by knowledge and belief?

The book reflects the contemporary effort to unite formal and psychological approaches to the understanding of the mind of the language user engaged in discourse and reasoning.
By treating reasoning and discourse processes together the book affords new insights into problems of topical interest in cognitive science. For example, the coherence of valid argument and the coherence of discourse may be underpinned by the same representational means.

This volume presents extensive new empirical evidence supporting the critical role of non-conscious cognition in human development and adjustment. Over 30 experiments on social information processing are described. The results demonstrate that every consciously controlled cognitive process is in fact accompanied by extensive information processing that is not mediated by conscious awareness. Information is nonconsciously acquired, generalized, and stored in long-term memory as abstract rules which, in turn, influence subsequent cognitive processes. Based on this evidence, the author goes on to detail an entirely new theoretical approach: the theory of internal processing algorithms.

The shocking exposé of how terrorists, Nazis and Latin American death squads have infested the World Anti-Communist League

"Inside The League" is an exposé of the World Anti-Communist League, the largest and most powerful international body of anti-Communist vigilantism in existence. It focuses on some of the more notorious individuals directly and indirectly associated with it. It is an alarming revelation of the extent to which terrorism has become a worldwide instrument of foreign relations.
