

The book cover features a vibrant abstract design. The background is a deep blue, overlaid with various green elements. In the top left, there's a vertical green band with a textured, almost stippled appearance. To the right, a series of thin, swirling green lines spiral upwards. The bottom left corner is dominated by a large, thick green spiral. Scattered throughout are various green geometric shapes: triangles, a circle, and a small square. The overall effect is dynamic and artistic.

Language Teacher Supervision

A Case-Based Approach

KATHLEEN M. BAILEY

*Cambridge Language
Teaching Library*

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Language Teacher Supervision

A Case-Based Approach

Kathleen M. Bailey

Graduate School of Languages and Educational Linguistics
Monterey Institute of International Studies

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Cambridge, New York, Melbourne, Madrid, Cape Town, Singapore, São Paulo

Cambridge University Press

32 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10013-2473, USA

www.cambridge.org

Information on this title: www.cambridge.org/9780521838689

© Cambridge University Press 2006

This publication is in copyright. Subject to statutory exception and to the provisions of relevant collective licensing agreements, no reproduction of any part may take place without the written permission of Cambridge University Press.

First published 2006

Printed in the United States of America

A catalog record for this publication is available from the British Library.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Bailey, Kathleen M.

Language teacher supervision : a case-based approach / Kathleen M. Bailey.

p. cm. – (Cambridge language teaching library)

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN-13: 978-0-521-83868-9

ISBN-10: 0-521-83868-1

ISBN-13: 978-0-521-54745-1 (pbk.)

ISBN-10: 0-521-54745-8 (pbk.)

1. Language teachers – Training of. 2. Observation (educational method)

I. Title. II. Series.

P53.85.B35 2006

418.0071'1 – dc22

2006043858

ISBN-13 978 0 521 83868 9 hardback

ISBN-10 0 521 83868 1 hardback

ISBN-13 978 0 521 54745 1 paperback

ISBN-10 0 521 54745 8 paperback

Cambridge University Press has no responsibility for the persistence or accuracy of URLs for external or third-party Internet Web sites referred to in this publication and does not guarantee that any content on such Web sites is, or will remain, accurate or appropriate.

Language Teacher Supervision: A Case-Based Approach

CAMBRIDGE LANGUAGE TEACHING LIBRARY

A series covering central issues in language teaching and learning, by authors who have expert knowledge in their field.

In this series:

- Affect in Language Learning edited by Jane Arnold
Approaches and Methods in Language Teaching second edition by Jack C. Richards and Theodore S. Rodgers
Beyond Training by Jack C. Richards
Classroom Decision-Making edited by Michael Breen and Andrew Littlejohn
Collaborative Action Research for English Language Teachers by Anne Burns
Collaborative Language Learning and Teaching edited by David Nunan
Communicative Language Teaching by William Littlewood
Developing Reading Skills by Françoise Grellet
Developments in English for Specific Purposes by Tony Dudley-Evans and Maggie Jo St John
Discourse Analysis for Language Teachers by Michael McCarthy
Discourse and Language Education by Evelyn Hatch
The Dynamics of the Language Classroom by Ian Tudor
English for Academic Purposes by R. R. Jordan
English for Specific Purposes by Tom Hutchinson and Alan Waters
Establishing Self-Access by David Gardner and Lindsay Miller
Foreign and Second Language Learning by William Littlewood
Group Dynamics in the Language Classroom by Zoltán Dörnyei and Tim Murphey
Language Learning in Distance Education by Cynthia White
Language Learning in Intercultural Perspective edited by Michael Byram and Michael Fleming
The Language Teaching Matrix by Jack C. Richards
Language Test Construction and Evaluation by J. Charles Alderson, Caroline Clapham and Dianne Wall
Learner-Centredness as Language Education by Ian Tudor
Managing Curricular Innovation by Numa Markee
Materials Development in Language Teaching edited by Brian Tomlinson
Motivational Strategies in the Language Classroom by Zoltán Dörnyei
Psychology for Language Teachers by Marion Williams and Robert L. Burden
Research Methods in Language Learning by David Nunan
Rules, Patterns and Words: Grammar and Lexis in English Language Teaching by Dave Willis
Second Language Teacher Education edited by Jack C. Richards and David Nunan
Society and the Language Classroom edited by Hywel Coleman
Teaching Languages to Young Learners by Lynne Cameron
Teacher Learning in Language Teaching edited by Donald Freeman and Jack C. Richards
Testing for Language Teachers second edition by Arthur Hughes
Understanding Research in Second Language Learning by James Dean Brown
Using Surveys in Language Programs by James Dean Brown
Vocabulary: Description, Acquisition and Pedagogy edited by Norbert Schmitt and Michael McCarthy
Vocabulary, Semantics and Language Education by Evelyn Hatch and Cheryl Brown
Voices from the Language Classroom edited by Kathleen M. Bailey and David Nunan

To
Richard K. McMillan
(1951–2001)

First brother.

First friend.

First person I ever thought I supervised.

Preface

This book is about language teacher supervision – a profession that many teachers enter almost by accident. Teachers can be promoted into supervisory positions for many reasons: they are excellent teachers, they have experience, they have “people skills,” they are seen as loyal to the administration, they have seniority, and so on. Seldom are teachers made supervisors because they have had specific professional preparation for the role.

Sometimes teacher supervision feels like a tug-of-war, a power struggle between the supervisor and the supervisee. At other times, supervision can be a very rewarding profession, full of teamwork. As I look back upon my own career, it appears that I have been working between the tug-of-war and the teamwork for more than 30 years.

This book is a combination literature review and casebook. It is not a memoir, although some of my experiences are woven into it. My first supervisory job was in Korea in the summer of 1973. I was hired to teach and coordinate a remedial reading component of an education program for American soldiers. The only requirement for teaching in this program was a bachelor's degree in any field. With my teaching credential and limited experience, I was seen as one of the best-prepared reading teachers in the region, so I was asked to be a supervising teacher for the program. A motley assortment of people taught these remedial reading classes, most with no preparation and all with no support except the textbooks and whatever advice I could give them. Some teachers were book-bound, droning on and on, telling the students to turn to the next page, complete the exercise, raise their hands when they were done. When I gave these teachers feedback, some complained about my lack of skills or training as a supervisor, just as I complained about their lack of skills or training as reading teachers.

In August 1976, I completed my master's degree at UCLA. My thesis was a small experiment about observation systems in language teacher education. Then, one month after I finished my degree, I was hired as the coordinator of the ESL program at UCLA. I found myself observing teachers (many who were more experienced than I), giving them feedback, and writing evaluations. Anxiety permeated my days, but gradually I developed a modicum of professionalism as a supervisor, although it was a slow and painful process.

I completed my doctoral coursework and started teaching in the new master's degree program in TESOL at the Monterey Institute of International Studies in September 1981. In five years, the department grew to a full-time faculty of five, plus some adjunct professors. I became department chair and was expected to observe and evaluate professors whose skills and knowledge bases were different from mine. Thanks to their professionalism and cooperative spirit, there were no supervisory crises.

In September 1988, I became the director of the intensive English program at the Monterey Institute. For two years, during times of declining enrollment and tight budgets, I tried to keep the program alive. Watching the ESL teachers work with the students, I was constantly reminded of how many creative ways there are to accomplish instructional goals. The classroom observations and evaluations directly affected decisions as to which teachers would receive contracts during the next session, so it was very important for me to do a good job.

At the Monterey Institute, we began offering a Certificate in Language Program Administration in September 1993. For this program, a 30-hour seminar I had been teaching on language teacher education and supervision was split into two courses. At that point, I realized that about 70 percent of the former course had been on teacher education and only about 30 percent addressed teacher supervision. So I started reading, combing the literature for information about language teacher supervision. Such literature was very limited, and I turned to the work on supervision in business and industry as well as in general education. For six years, I taught the supervision course from a compilation of photocopied articles and not-quite-appropriate textbooks that were borrowed from other disciplines. A sense of coherence in language teacher supervision continued to elude me.

In September 1999, in an attempt to impose some order on the chaos, I began to write a manuscript on language teacher supervision. This book – a combination literature review and casebook – is the result. The cases came easily, born of experiences (mine, my colleagues', my MA students'). However, reviewing the literature was a daunting task because the books and articles about supervision come from such diverse fields. The literature includes research and opinion pieces from general education, psychotherapy, foreign language education, business and industry, and social work.

Now that the manuscript is done, a real, bound book, I hope you will enjoy and benefit from the results of this work. Perhaps for you, gaining knowledge about supervision and developing skills as a professional language teacher supervisor will be more purposeful and straightforward than the largely haphazard endeavor it has been for me and many others like me.

Acknowledgments

This book on language teacher supervision was written with the support of many helpful individuals. I am very grateful to all of them for their input and encouragement.

My colleagues at the Monterey Institute of International Studies contributed both explicitly and implicitly to the volume's production. In particular I want to thank the teachers in the TESOL-TFL Program, the English Studies Program, the language courses, and the Intensive English Program, who graciously allowed my graduate students and me to observe their classes and discuss their teaching with them over the years.

The graduate students in the Monterey Institute's seminar on language teacher supervision helped me refine the ideas presented in this book. I especially want to thank the members of the fall semester 2000 class, who read and discussed the draft cases with me. The students in the fall semester 2001 class read the entire book in draft form. Various iterations of the revised manuscript were used by the students in fall semesters of 2002, 2003, and 2004.

In the Monterey Institute library, Zooey Lober patiently processed hundreds of interlibrary loan requests, with assistance from Joan Ryan and Jennifer Waterson.

The writing of this book was supported by the Mark Award for Faculty Development, a grant from Joseph and Sheila Mark, who have helped many Monterey Institute professors over the years. I gratefully acknowledge both their financial assistance and their moral support.

The text as it emerged was word processed by my incredibly capable student helpers: Angela Dadak, Steven Hales, Sarah Springer, Bethany Alling, and Britt Johnson. Britt's key role as my editorial assistant was made possible by the Marks' generous donation. Her responsibilities during the time we worked on this volume ranged from word processing to library and Web-based research, to pointing out problems of clarity in the text and keeping me sane. When Britt graduated, Sarah Springer continued, with grace, patience, and skill. Then Melanie Anderson and Jessica Massie came back from their Peace Corps assignments (in Russia and Guinea, respectively) to help with the final manuscript preparation.

Toward the end of the revision process, three anonymous reviewers provided detailed suggestions for improving the manuscript. While I have not incorporated all their suggestions, I hope that each of them will recognize evidence of their ideas in these chapters. I expect that all three are excellent supervisors, since their feedback was clear and supportive, striking a fine balance between criticism and encouragement. At Cambridge University Press, the book was guided into print by Angela Castro, Kayo Taguchi, and Kathleen Corley.

The work of many scholars, teachers, and teacher educators has shaped this book. In particular, the publications of Ruth Wajnryb, Michael Wallace, Jerry Gebhard, and Karen Johnson have influenced my thinking considerably. Reading the work of Donald Freeman, David Nunan, Bob Oprandy, and Leo van Lier, and talking directly with these authors, has been both challenging and fruitful.

And, as always, Les endured patiently while photocopied articles, sketchy figures, and books about language teacher supervision littered our home and our lives. I'm sorry you couldn't wait until it was done, sweetheart. The dining room table is cleared off now.

Contents

Preface	xiii
Acknowledgments	xv
Chapter 1 Doing supervision: Roles and skills	1
Case for analysis: Your new job as a language teacher supervisor	2
Supervision as a profession	2
What is language teacher supervision?	4
Supervisors' varied roles in professional contexts	6
Roles of teacher supervisors in general education	8
Supervisory roles in language education contexts	13
Supervisory skills	17
The case approach to teaching and learning	22
Concluding comments	27
Chapter 2 Awareness and attitude	34
Case for analysis: A question of varieties	34
Awareness and language teacher supervision	35
Attitudes, language teaching, and language teacher supervision	40
Sociocultural theory and language teacher supervision	42
Working with teachers' knowledge and skills	44
Attitudes, awareness, and teachers' journals	47
Promoting awareness and development	49
Concluding comments	50
Chapter 3 Autonomy and authority	54
Case for analysis: The "teacher's pet" issue	54
Autonomy in second language learning and teaching contexts	55
Autonomy, supervision, and power	60
Autonomy and self-regulated action	63
Autonomy in decision making and action taking	68
Authority	73
Concluding comments	77

Chapter 4	Issues in observing language teachers	81
	Case for analysis: Getting through the door	81
	To observe or not to observe: That is the first question	82
	To collect data or not to collect data: That is the second question	86
	Key concepts in data collection	92
	Concluding comments	95
Chapter 5	Manual data collection procedures	99
	Case for analysis: Wrong place on the audiotape	99
	Generating field notes as classroom data	100
	Using observation instruments	112
	Concluding comments	118
Chapter 6	Electronic data collection procedures	122
	Case for analysis: Working with a transcript	122
	Using audiotapes to collect observational data	123
	Using videotapes to collect observational data	124
	Advantages and disadvantages of electronic data collection	127
	Using transcripts	129
	Triangulation in data collection	131
	Technological developments in supervision	132
	Concluding comments	135
Chapter 7	The post-observation conference	140
	Case for analysis: Classroom control issues	140
	The role of feedback in language teacher supervision	141
	Factors affecting supervisory discourse	148
	Macroanalyses of the post-observation conference	150
	Supervisors' nonverbal behavior during post-observation conferences	156
	Concluding comments	157
Chapter 8	Mitigation and the microanalysis of supervisory discourse	160
	Case for analysis: A tricky post-observation conference	160
	Face-threatening acts in the feedback conference	164
	Mitigation in supervisory discourse	166
	Syntactic mitigation devices	171
	Semantic mitigation devices	174
	Indirect mitigation devices	177
	Concluding comments	179

Chapter 9	Purposes, participants, and principles in language teacher evaluation	182
	Case for analysis: Summative evaluation of two teachers	182
	Purposes of teacher evaluation	184
	Sources of input: Participants in the language teacher evaluation process	185
	Principles for language teacher evaluation	192
	Portfolio assessment	194
	Problems in language teacher evaluation	198
	Concluding comments	202
Chapter 10	Criteria for language teacher evaluation	206
	Case for analysis: Letter of recommendation	207
	Evaluative criteria	208
	Problems in defining effective teaching	213
	Factors influencing teacher effectiveness	217
	Allocated time and engaged time	219
	Concluding comments	222
Chapter 11	Supervising preservice language teachers	225
	Case for analysis: The practicum student	225
	The prevalence of research on preservice teacher supervision	226
	Situational leadership and language teacher supervision	227
	Participants in the supervision of student teachers	233
	Problems in giving feedback to preservice teachers	242
	Concluding comments	247
Chapter 12	Supervising teaching assistants	251
	Case for analysis: Rater reliability	251
	The work of teaching assistants	252
	The central dilemma in supervising teaching assistants	253
	International teaching assistants	257
	Coordination and quality control	258
	Strategies for supervising teaching assistants	260
	Concluding comments	262
Chapter 13	Supervising in-service language teachers	267
	Case for analysis: The curriculum issue	267
	Teacher decision making and language teacher supervision	269

The induction years	276
Attitudinal factors in the supervision of language teachers	277
Research on supervision in in-service contexts	284
Concluding comments	289

Chapter 14	Supervising non-native-speaking teachers	293
	Case for analysis: Working with less-than-proficient language teachers	293
	Nativeness in the broader context	294
	Issues in working with non-native teachers	297
	Strategies for supporting non-native-speaking language teachers	298
	Defining language proficiency standards for teachers	300
	Language teachers' perceptions	306
	Concluding comments	310

Chapter 15	Professionalism, paradigm shifts, and language teacher supervision	314
	Case for analysis: Exploring our options	315
	Teacher professionalism and language teacher supervision	318
	Reflective teaching and language teacher supervision	325
	Alternatives to supervision	332
	Supervision in service to teaching and learning	340
	Concluding comments	341

References	345
Author index	373
Subject index	379

1 Doing supervision: Roles and skills

This book is intended for people who might become language teacher supervisors, as well as for those who already have supervisory responsibilities. It reviews literature on supervision in a variety of settings, including applied linguistics, business and industry, psychotherapy, general education, social work, and an emerging body of work in language teacher supervision itself. The majority of the literature cited here comes from North American contexts, but I have indicated those parts of the text that draw on research and practice from other regions.

Writing this book as a traditional literature review would be like using only the physics of motion and gravity to explain the art of Olympic pairs figure skating. Theory and research alone cannot capture the complicated dynamics of a masterly performance. Nor would a literature review about ice-skating greatly help inexperienced skaters with buckling ankles and unsteady balance increase their skills.

While language teacher supervision is not as physically demanding as pairs figure skating, it is dynamic, emotionally charged, and interactive, and there are many trials involved in supervising well. For these reasons this book combines a literature review with the case approach; and since supervision involves interaction, the cases are designed to put you, the reader, into situations requiring communication.

Because this book is in part based on my experiences and those of my students and colleagues, it is necessarily personal, and full of my own opinions and recommendations. I have tried to flag the parts of the text that are opinion and those that result from research or theory. For instance, I and me indicate my opinion or personal experience. And we is not the royal or the editorial we; rather, it marks my shared experiences with readers (you), either as teachers or as supervisors.

Finally, because the purpose of this book is to help supervisors (or future supervisors) do their work better and more confidently, each chapter contains activities to help you apply the concepts presented. These activities consist of the Case Discussion (about the specific case presented in the chapter), Tasks and Discussion (related to broader supervisory contexts), and Suggestions for Further Reading (to help you pursue your interest in the topic).

This chapter begins with a case that is based on a true story. The chapter then discusses supervision as a profession, focusing specifically on language teacher supervision. It reviews the roles of supervisors in various professional contexts, including education, before discussing the particular skills supervisors need. A rationale is also provided for using the case approach for learning about language teacher supervision. We will begin with a case to contextualize the issues raised in this chapter.

Case for analysis: Your new job as a language teacher supervisor

You have just completed your postgraduate work in applied linguistics and language teaching at a university that provides both language instruction and teacher education. During your studies you had a teaching assistantship (TA-ship), which enabled you to make money and to gain experience by teaching language classes as you completed your degree.

Upon finishing your degree, you are hired on a part-time basis to teach and to assist the professor who will supervise the teaching assistants (TAs) in the coming year. You will observe classes, help the new TAs learn about the curriculum, hold office hours, and administer the final examinations. You feel well prepared for the language classes you will teach, but you view your supervisory role with some trepidation, as you have had only a little prior experience in observing teachers, and it was not entirely positive. Nevertheless, you feel that you may gain some skills that will be beneficial to you by assisting the professor in charge of the teaching assistants.

Three weeks before the semester begins, that professor resigns. The teacher education professors in the department don't want to supervise the TAs; they feel this job consumes time that they should devote to research and publishing. The department chair therefore appoints you to serve as the TA supervisor for the coming year. There is no formal job description, but you are given a temporary faculty appointment, including benefits and a reasonable salary. That's the good news. The bad news is that you will be supervising and evaluating some of your closest friends, as well as some language teachers who are older and more experienced than you are.

Supervision as a profession

The status of supervision as a specific profession has been discussed in many fields, including business and industry, psychology, social work, and education. Writing about supervision in general education, Alfonso, Firth, and Neville have said:

A major deterrent to full professional status of educational supervisors is an ill-defined knowledge base and a lack of an agreed-upon set of professional skills. Every profession equips its members with a conceptual and intellectual base from which skills are derived and expressed in practice. The skills of instructional supervision, however, have remained remarkably undefined and random, partly because the theoretical base is so thin. Moreover, the skills that are used are generally acquired on the job, rather than during professional preparation and internship. (1984:16)

Bernard has noted a similar situation in the preparation of clinical psychologists. She says that “unlike the literature that addresses counselor training, little has been said about the training of supervisors” (1979:60). Indeed, this lack of preparation for supervisors is a repeated theme in the literature of various professions. In recent years, however, publications in general education have suggested this situation is changing.

During the later decades of the past century, teacher supervision emerged as a career track in language education. Perhaps this trend developed because language teaching has become a commercial enterprise, and supervisors are needed to make sure that customers get what they pay for. Or maybe, in aspiring to establish language teaching as a profession, teachers have chosen to monitor their own programs’ instructional practices (Nunan, 1999a, 1999b). On the other hand, perhaps so much language teaching around the world is done by people without professional preparation that there is a need for quality control mechanisms. Maybe language educators have simply adopted general education’s traditional bureaucratic structures, including having certain employees be responsible for ensuring the quality of others’ work.

Whatever the reasons, many language teachers find themselves working as supervisors. Their duties include visiting and evaluating other teachers, discussing their lessons with them, and making recommendations to them about what to continue and what to change.

Unfortunately, very few language teachers ever receive any formal preparation for carrying out supervisors’ responsibilities. It is often assumed that teachers who are promoted to supervisorial positions will automatically know how to supervise because they have seniority or because they have displayed leadership qualities. Some are appointed as supervisors because they are stable, cooperative employees. Still others attain teacher supervision positions because they are recognized as effective teachers. If they continue to teach while in their supervisory positions, presumably they will serve as good role models. If their new duties mean they no longer teach, then they are expected to convey to