

SUPERVISION IN SOCIAL WORK

THIRD EDITION

ALFRED KADUSHIN

Alfred Kadushin

Supervision in Social Work

THIRD EDITION

Columbia University Press
NEW YORK

Columbia University Press
New York Chichester, West Sussex
Copyright © 1976, 1985, 1992 Columbia University Press
All rights reserved

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Kadushin, Alfred.

Supervision in social work / Alfred Kadushin.—3rd ed.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references (p. 515) and index.

ISBN 0-231-07108-6

1. Social workers—Supervision of. 2. Social workers—
Supervision of—United States. I. Title.

HV40.54.K33 1992

361.3'2'0683—dc20

92-4506

CIP

Casebound editions of Columbia University Press books are printed on permanent and durable acid-free paper.

Printed in the United States of America

c 10 9 8

Preface

The first edition of the book was published in 1976, the second edition in 1985. A third edition at this time seems necessary, given the continued concern with supervision and the sizable number of books and articles related to social work supervision published since 1985. Some older concerns have become archaic, and some new concerns have become increasingly visible.

The book provides an overview of the state of the art of social work supervision. It is addressed to supervisors and those preparing to do supervision, whatever their formal educational background. It is also useful to social work supervisees, students, and workers in enabling them to make more productive use of supervision.

The book is designed to help the reader understand the place of supervision in the social agency, the functions it performs, the process of supervision, and the problems with which it is currently concerned. While no book can directly further the development of skills, it provides the knowledge base that is a necessary prerequisite to learning how to supervise. The book frees the course instructor from the burden of presenting the general background of supervision so that more time can be devoted to consideration of clinical material and controversial points of view.

Changes in public social welfare policy during the past ten years have intensified concern about social work supervision, particularly its administrative responsibilities. Concerns for efficiency and productivity have been added to the continuing concern for accountability. Tax and spending limitations at all levels of government and growing budgetary stringency have resulted in reduction of financial support for social service agency programs. The current situation is characterized by reduction in staff, retrenchment in programming, and limitations in resources available to agencies.

Social agencies are labor-intensive operations. The current political context, which now provides less financial support for social services, calls for doing more with less. One possible if difficult solution is to increase the productivity of each worker. Increasing productivity requires greater managerial efficiency and more imaginative agency management. With the constriction of resources, practice has become more time limited and results oriented. This has intensified requirements for accountability and the need to justify the legitimacy of the agency through the demonstration of efficiency and effectiveness.

Organizational survival may hinge on the ability of administrative supervision to fine-tune agency performance, increase efficiency, and deploy limited staff more effectively. Supervisory personnel are the crucial element in dealing with worker efficiency and productivity as they were in meeting the earlier demands for increased agency accountability.

More limited resources and the demands associated with taxpayer revolts have made issues of accountability a matter of much greater concern than ever before. Since agency accountability starts with the supervisor's review and evaluation of the work of the direct service staff, such issues intensify the visibility and importance of supervision.

The increasing dependence of agencies on governmental funding, third-party payments, and legislative mandates all have resulted in the increasing external regulation of agencies. The need for documentation of agency activities through periodic reports further increases the need for administrative supervision to ensure that such information is available. Compliance with external regulatory requirements of funding sources such as Medicaid, Medicare, and Title XX puts a premium on the need for supervisory personnel. Community Mental Health Centers are among the agencies that depend heavily on third-party payments for support and consequently face legislative mandates for rigorous accountability. A questionnaire study of Community Mental Health Center supervisors' perceptions of effective accountability mechanisms found that all 117 respondents saw a "well-coordinated and explicit system of supervision as the most preferred approach to facilitating a Community Mental Health Center-based quality assurance program” (Smith 1986:9).

Some regulatory changes during the last ten years have once again increased the importance and significance of social work supervision. Insurance carriers often require that the worker receive formal supervision as a third-party condition for payment. Licensing and registration legislation adopted by 1988 in some forty-six states often requires that licensed or registered workers have formal access to supervision.

Reduction in services and resources available to the social worker has resulted in a greater need to prioritize work and to prioritize decisions regarding the allocation of scarce supplies. Now more than ever before the worker is faced with the necessity of making difficult decisions regarding what gets done, what is ignored, who is provided service, and who is denied service. Many triage decisions now require, if not the help, at least the shared responsibility of a representative of management. Such situations increase the need for supervisory personnel.

Supervision and in-service training and staff development share responsibility for helping the worker learn what he needs to know in order to effectively do his job. Cuts in agency budgets have frequently required cuts in in-service training and staff development programs. Agencies have increasing difficulty in funding worker attendance at workshops or institutes and national meetings. As a consequence, supervision becomes increasingly more important as a source of training and often is the only resource available to help workers enhance their skills.

Recognition of the need for supervision has been formalized, in that candidates for the title of certified social worker (ACSW) are required to have been supervised for a minimum of two years following the MSW. Similarly, other specialized professional organizations that enlist social workers require minimum hours of supervised practice for licensing or registration. This includes organizations such as The American Association of Marriage and Family Therapists and The National Commission for Credentialing of Alcoholism Counselors.

The ascendance of a political orientation that seeks to curtail the development of social programs and limit access to resources increases the importance of supervision for preserving the commitment of social work to a political orientation that is more humanistic. An orientation antagonistic to the objectives and values of social work has been made evident not only in legislative changes but in attempts at imposing business management technologies on social agencies. The increasing tendency to appoint business managers to administer social agencies has been encouraged by the proliferation of business administration graduates who are actively seeking such positions.

If social work, in defense of its own values, hopes to resist such impositions, it needs to be concerned with increasing the effectiveness of its own managerial practices. Concern by social agencies with improving the practice of supervision is one approach to contesting the imposition by outsiders of managerial practices that might conflict with the values, ethics, and philosophy of social work. "We" rather than "they" would formulate and implement the changes in managerial practice. In doing so, we would increase the certainty that social agency administration reflects social work ideology.

Changes in the relationship between human service organizations and the courts during the last ten years have also increased the significance of supervisory personnel. The last decade has been characterized by increases in the frequency of legal challenges to human service programs as courts more actively inquire into areas previously left to the discretion of agencies.

With increased attention to client's rights and malpractice suits, many ethical and professional issues have been transformed into legal issues. The increased possibility of legal action against agencies by clients and community groups highlights the need for supervision to prevent damaging challenges from developing.

In a chapter devoted to negligent supervision as a basis for malpractice suits, Austin, Moline, and Williams (1990) advise supervisors to keep records that are complete and up to date, to document meetings with supervisees, and to take care in seeing that insurance forms for clients are completed properly.

Since the publication of the first edition, another previously unexplored problem—the problem of worker burnout—was "discovered" and given considerable attention in the literature. The relevance to supervision of this new development lies in the fact that the research on burnout has concluded that supportive supervision is a key prophylactic and palliative for burnout.

Though calls for more supervision predominate, some changes reduce the need for supervision. The tightened job market has reduced turnover and has increased the time social workers spend in a given position; experienced workers need less supervision than beginners; and there is a tendency to reduce agency managerial costs by eliminating layers of supervision as part of a general trend toward debureaucratizing agencies. On balance, however, recent changes tend to suggest a heightened concern with social agency supervision.

All these developments justify a third edition. Widespread use of the book in courses, workshops, and institutes has clearly identified some of the strengths and weaknesses of the previous editions. Based on the feedback from supervisors and supervisees, students, and instructors, a third edition can also give increased priority to the strengths and eliminate some of the shortcomings of the earlier editions.

Some readers complain that the book presents an unrealistic, visionary picture of supervision, that it presents supervision as it should be rather than how it is. A letter from one reader said, "I just can't help but wonder where all those supervisors are that you describe so beautifully with all their right techniques and all their wisdom and all their understanding and time and patience. I can tell you I have never seen such a one and neither has anybody else here." Touché and mea culpa. In the real world of heavy caseloads, tight budgets, and increasingly difficult problems, these objections are admittedly well grounded. The text's image of supervision is an idealized image rather than a picture of supervision as it is actually practiced. Supervision as described in the text exists nowhere in practice. The reader need not feel quilt or anxiety that his/her experience with supervision falls short, in some measure, of the image presented in the text, as inevitably everyone's does. There is some justification for presenting a systematic synthesis of the best in social work supervision. It suggests the ideal against which we can measure our practice and reveals the direction in which changes need to be made. It reflects Cicero's reminder that "no wind is favorable unless you know the port to which you are heading." The modern translation of this is: "If you don't know where you are going, you will probably end up somewhere else."

From time to time throughout the text I offer a vignette or an anecdote. It always begins with "A supervisor (or supervisee) says——". These illustrations were gathered over the thirty years that I have been teaching and researching social work supervision. In graduate seminars, institutes, and workshops, I have urged, coaxed, cajoled, importuned participants to share with me critical incidents and memorable encounters that graphically exemplify some important aspect of supervision. The illustrations cited in the text without attribution come from this collection of material.

Since field instruction in graduate and undergraduate social work education have elements in common with agency supervision, we reviewed fieldwork manuals from fifty schools of social work and reviewed the rich literature on field instruction. In the end, the need to keep the length of the text within reasonable bounds dictated a decision not to include this material. Differences between agency supervision and field instruction in educational programs are sufficiently pervasive to justify this decision.

I have made a studied effort to be generic in my presentation. Alas, this book is heavily weighted in the direction of casework. In asking forgiveness I plead ex nihilo, nihil fit—out of nothing, nothing can be made. The experience of the profession and, consequently the available literature are heavily weighted in the direction of casework supervision. There is little recent material on supervision in group work and almost nothing on supervision in community organization.

Pronouns are a source of trouble throughout the text. At one time it would suffice to note that all supervisors would be designated “she” and all supervisees “he.” We are beyond the point where such conventional designations are acceptable. Consequently, I have randomized the use of pronouns. He, she, her, and his are scattered throughout the text in no particular pattern except to equalize the frequency with which they are used.

Ethnic language has also been a problem for the third edition. At the time this was being written the term African American was being suggested as an alternative to black. The suggested change had not, however, achieved widespread acceptability. As a consequence we continue to use “black” in this edition as the racial term of choice.

The first edition was written during the year that I was a fellow at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Palo Alto, California. My very warm thanks and sincere appreciation to the Center for the opportunity the fellowship provided. It offered not only financial support but also a stimulating, supportive atmosphere. During the year at the center I was a member of a fellows seminar on organizational theory. The seminar discussions were relevant to the problems of social work supervision, and I am indebted to other members of the seminar—Michael Crozier, Herbert Jacobs, Martin Krieger, James March, Eugene Pusic, Daniel Shimshoni, Judith Tandler, Julian Wolpert—for helping me clarify my ideas.

My sincere appreciation and thanks to Carol Betts and LuAnn Stibes, indefatigable secretaries who patiently and accurately typed revisions to revisions of revisions, deciphered my hand-written hieroglyphics, and conscientiously typed many more pages than appear here.

My thanks to John D. Moore of Columbia University Press for his continuing encouragement during the thirty years of our professional association.

To Sylvia, severest critic and most compassionate friend, my deepest love for constant help, support, and comfort, as well as to Goldie and Raphael, formerly children, now my friends. In affectionate friendship to Dave and Tudella and Mickey, and in loving memory of my parents, Phillip and Celia.

A. K.

Contents

Preface	xv
1 History, Definition, and Significance	1
Historical Development	1
Development of Education for Social Work	7
Developing a Literature on Social Work Supervision	11
Supervision in Group Work and Community Organization	14
Toward a Definition	18
The Functions of Supervision	19
The Objectives of Supervision	20
The Hierarchical Position of Supervisors	21
Supervision as an Indirect Service	22
Supervision as an Interactional Process	22
Definition of Supervision	22
Empirical Validation of Definition	23
Ecology of Social Work Supervision	26
Community: General and Professional	26
The Social Work Profession	27

	The Social Work Agency	28
	The Unit within the Agency	28
	Supervisor-Supervisee Dyad (Supervisee Group)	28
	The Demography of Social Work Supervision	29
	The Significance of Supervision in Social Work	30
	Summary	43
2	Administrative Supervision	44
	Introduction—Organizational Bureaucracy
	Tasks	44
	Staff Recruitment and Selection	46
	Inducting and Placing the Worker	47
	Work Planning	50
	Work Assignment	52
	Work Delegation	56
	Monitoring, Reviewing, and Evaluating Work	60
	Coordinating Work	62
	The Communication Function	63
	The Supervisor as Advocate	69
	The Supervisor as Administrative Buffer	71
	The Supervisor as Change Agent and Community Liaison	74
	Summary	77
3	Administrative Supervision—Problems in Implementation	78
	The Problem of Vicarious Liability	78
	The Problem of Authority and Power	81
	Rationale for Authority and Power	81
	Supervisory Authority and Sources of Power	84
	Interrelationships Between Types of Supervisory Power	89
	Legitimation of Authority Through Peers	94
	Nonauthoritarian Authority	95
	Problems in the Implementation of Supervisory Authority	99
	Avoidance and Abrogation of Authority and Power by Supervisors	99
	Organizational Factors Attenuating Supervisory Power and Authority	104
	Supervisee Countervailing Power	109

	The Problem of Rules, Noncompliance, and Disciplinary Action	115
	The Functional Value of Rules	115
	Understanding Noncompliance	120
	Monitoring Noncompliance—Supervisor Responsibility	127
	Taking Disciplinary Action	129
	Summary	133
4	Educational Supervision—Definition, Differentiation, Content, and Process	135
	Educational Supervision Distinguished from In-Service Training and Staff Development	136
	Significance of Educational Supervision	137
	Relationship of Educational Supervision to Administrative Supervision	138
	Content in Educational Supervision	142
	The Individual Conference	149
	Process—Beginning: Structure and Scheduling	149
	Process—Beginning: Preparation	151
	Process—The Middle Phase	153
	Orientations to the Process of Educational Supervision	161
	Process—Feedback	163
	Termination of Educational Supervision Conference	166
	The Sequential Steps in the Teaching-Learning Process	168
	Process Studies	168
	Case Illustrations	171
	Summary	180
5	Principles and Problems in Implementing Educational Supervision	182
	Conditions for Effective Teaching and Learning—Introduction	182
	Principle 1: We Learn Best If We Are Highly Motivated to Learn	183
	Principle 2: We Learn Best When We Can Devote Most of Our Energies in the Learning Situation to Learning	186

Principle 3: We Learn Best When Learning Is Attended by Positive Satisfaction—When It Is Successful and Rewarding	190
Principle 4: We Learn Best If We Are Actively Involved in the Learning Process	193
Principle 5: We Learn Best If the Content Is Meaningfully Presented	194
Principle 6: We Learn Best If the Supervisor Takes into Consideration the Supervisee’s Uniqueness as a Learner	196
The Significance of the Supervisor-Supervisee Relationship for Educational Supervision	200
Educational Supervision Versus Therapy	203
Differences Between Supervision and Therapy	203
Problems in Implementation of Therapy—Educational Supervision Distinction	209
Acceptance of Distinction Between Supervision and Therapy: Empirical Data	211
Developmental Supervision	213
The Parallel Process Component in Educational Supervision	217
The Supervisor’s Problems in Implementing Educational Supervision	220
Summary	224
6 Supportive Supervision	225
Introduction and Overview	225
Burnout: Definition and Symptoms	233
Sources of Job-related Stress for the Supervisee	236
Administrative Supervision as a Source of Stress	237
Educational Supervision as a Source of Stress	237
The Supervisor-Supervisee Relationship as a Source of Stress	239
The Client as a Source of Stress	243
The Nature and Context of the Task as a Source of Stress	248
The Organization as a Source of Stress	252
Community Attitudes Toward Social Work as a Source of Stress	255
Worker Personality as a Factor in Burnout	258

Implementing Supportive Supervision	260
Prevention of Stress	262
Reducing and Ameliorating Stress	263
Recapitulation—and Some Caveats	273
The Value of Supportive Supervision—Research
Findings	274
Additional Sources of Support for Supervisees	278
The Client	278
The Peer Group	278
Social Support Network	279
Supervisees' Adaptations	279
Supervisees' Games	280
Manipulating Demands Levels	280
Redefining the Relationship	282
Reducing Power Disparity	283
Controlling the Situation	285
Countering Games	288
Humor in Supervision	290
Summary	292
7 Problems and Stresses in Becoming and Being a
Supervisor	293
Transition—Worker to Supervisor	294
Motives for Change	294
Preparation for Change	295
Changes in Self-Perception and Identity	297
From Clinician to Manager	301
Changes in Peer Relationships	303
Summary—Stress Associated with Becoming a
Supervisor	304
Ongoing Supervisor Stress: Problems in Being a
Supervisor	305
Age as a Factor in Supervision	310
Race as a Factor in Supervision	311
Gender as a Factor in Transition to Supervision	315
Gender as a Factor in Ongoing Supervision	317
Sexual Harassment—A Problem for Supervision	321
Problems Related to Hierarchical Position	324
Summary of Stresses Encountered by Supervisors	328
Coping with Stress—Supervisors' Adaptations	328

	Supervisors' Games	332
	The "Good" Supervisor	336
	Summary	340
8	Evaluation	341
	Definition	341
	Values of Evaluation	343
	Value to the Worker	343
	Value to the Agency	345
	Value to the Client	346
	Value to the Supervisor	346
	Objectives of Evaluation	347
	Dislike of Evaluations	348
	Desirable Evaluation Procedures	352
	Evaluation Conference—Process	357
	Scheduling the Conference	357
	Supervisor's Conference Preparation	358
	Worker's Conference Preparation	359
	Evaluation Conference Interaction	359
	Communication and Use of Evaluations	362
	Errors in Evaluation	365
	Evaluation Outlines and Rating Forms	368
	Evaluation Content Areas	371
	Sources of Information for Evaluation	388
	Evaluation of Supervisors	390
	Controversial Questions	394
	Summary	401
9	The Group Conference in Supervision	403
	Definition	404
	Advantages of Group Supervision	405
	Disadvantages of Group Supervision	413
	Individual and Group Supervision—Appropriate Use	417
	Research of Group Supervision	417
	Group Supervision—Process	419
	Group Setting	420
	Purpose	421
	Leadership and Planning	421
	Content and Method	424

Process in the Group Conference	427
Humor in Group Supervision	434
Illustration of Group Supervision	435
Summary	440
10 Problems and Innovations	442
Observation of Performance—The Nature of the Problem	442
Direct Observation	448
Sitting In	448
One-Way Mirrors	448
Cotherapy Supervision	449
Observation with Tapes	452
Supervision During the Interview	460
Bug-in-the-Ear and Live Supervision	461
Live Supervision	466
Observing Worker Performance—A Recapitulation	469
The Problem of Interminable Supervision	469
Interminable Supervision and Worker Autonomy	473
Attitudes Toward Interminable Supervision	477
Continuing Supervision and Client Protection	479
Terminating Interminable Supervision	480
Innovations for Increasing Worker Autonomy	482
Peer Supervision	482
Peer Consultation	484
Interminable Supervision and Debureaucratization	485
Agency Debureaucratization Experiences	488
Problem: The Professional and the Bureaucracy	491
Administrative and Educational Supervision—the Problem of Separation	496
Ethical Dilemmas in Supervision	498
Sexism and Social Work Administration	502
A Feminist Approach to Supervision	505
The Problem of Education for Supervision	507
A Perspective—the Positive Values of Professional Supervision	508
Summary	513
Bibliography	515
Index	559