these forms worked or indeed the actual deconstruction of the time, but it has been suggested that the intention was to maximize time available to achieve more as the size of the population grew. Perhaps such future periods of time were intended to benefit the community by allotting specific lengths of time to tasks. Was this the beginning of the working week?

Sun clocks

With the disappearance of any ancient civilization, such as the Sumerian (闪族人的) culture, knowledge is also lost. Whilst (同时) we can only hypothesize (假设) on the reasons of why the equivalent to the modern wristwatch was never completed, we know that the ancient Egyptians were next to layout a system of dividing the day into parts, similar to hours.

"Obelisks" (tall four-sided tapered monuments) were carefully constructed and even purposefully geographically located around 3,500 BC. A shadow was east as the Sun moved across the sky by the obelisk, which it appears was then marked out in sections, allowing people to clearly see the two halves of the day. Some of the sections have also been found to indicate the year's longest and shortest days, which it is thought were developments added later to allow identification of other important time subdivisions.

Another ancient Egyptian "shadow clock" or "sundial" has been discovered to have been in use around 1,500 BC, which allowed the measuring of the passage of "hours". The sections were divided into ten parts, with two "twilight hours" indicated, occurring in the morning and the evening. For it to work successfully then at midday or noon, the device had to he turned 180 degrees to measure the afternoon hours.

Water docks

"Water clocks" were among the earliest time keeping devices that didn't use the observation of the celestial (天空的) bodies to calculate the passage of time. The ancient Greeks, it is believed, began using water clocks around 325 BC. Most of these clocks were used to determine the hours of the night, but may have also been used during daylight. An inherent problem with the water clocks was that they were not totally accurate, as the system of measurement was based on the flow of water either into, or out of, a container which had markers around the sides. Another very similar form was that of a bowl that sank during a period as it was filled of water from a regulated flow. It is known that water clocks were common across the Middle East, and that these were still being used in North Africa during the early part of the twentieth century.

Mechanical clocks

In 1656, "Christian Huygens" (Dutch scientist), made the first "Pendulum (钟摆) clock", with a mechanism using a "natural" period of oscillation (振幅). "Galileo Galilei" is credited, in most historical books, for inventing the pendulum as early as 1,582, but his design was not built before his death. Huygens' clock, when built, had an error of "less than only one minute a day". This was a massive leap in the development of maintaining accuracy, as this had previously never been achieved. Later refinements to Scientific research and the demands of modem technology continue to drive our search for ever more accuracy. The next generation of Cesium Time Standards is presently under development at NIST's "Boulder Laboratory" and other laboratories around the world.

Something to remember

The only thing that should be remembered during all this technological development is that we should never lose the ability to tell the time approximately by natural means and the powers of deduction without requiring crutches (拐杖) to lean on.

Our concept of TIME and using it together with TECHNOLOGY still has room for radical reassessment in terms of man's evolutionary thinking regarding our view of the past, our onward journey into the future and our concept of time in relationship to universe.

Questions 57 to 61 are based on the following passage.

Since the early 1970's, historians have begun to devote serious attention to the working class in the United States. Yet while we now have studies of working class communities and culture, we know remarkably little of worklessness. When historians have paid any attention at all to unemployment, they have focused on the Great

Section C

Directions: In this section, you will hear a passage three times. When the passage is read for the first time, you should listen carefully for its general idea. When the passage is read for the second time, you are required to fill in the blanks numbered from 36 to 43 with the exact words you have just heard. For blanks numbered from 44 to 46 you are required to fill in the missing information. For these blanks, you can either use the exact words you have just heard or write down the main points in your own words. Finally, when the passage is read for the third time, you should check what you have written.

Very old people do raise moral problems for almost everyone who comes into contact with them. Their values—this can't be (36) too often—are not necessarily our values. Physical (37), cleanness and order are necessarily the most important things. The social services from time to time find themselves faced with a flat with (38)food covered by small worms, and an old person lying alone on bed, taking no (39) of the worms.
But is it (40) with personal freedom to insist that they go to live with some of their relatives so that they might be taken better care of? Some (41) workers, the ones who clear up the worms, think we are in danger of carrying this concept of personal freedom to the point where serious risks are being taken with the health and (42) of the old.

Reading Comprehension

(35 minutes)

Section A

Directions: In this section, there is a short passage with 5 questions or incomplete statements. Read the passage carefully. Then answer the questions or complete the statements in the fewest possible words. Please write your answers on Answer Sheet 2.

Call it the myth of industrial sin. It seems fish stocks were declining due to human exploitation long before the arrival of giant trawlers (拖捞船) and factory ships, according to marine scientists at a conference being held recently in Canada.

"We are discovering that human pressure on marine life was much earlier, much larger and much more significant than previously thought," says Poul Holm, an environmental historian at Trinity College Dublin in Ireland, "We now know that there was major commercial exploitation of fisheries, doing huge damage to fish populations, back in medieval times and even before. The idea that it is only modem fishing technology that has done damage turns out to be completely wrong." The Oceans Past II conference in Vancouver, Canada, is part of the decade-long Census of Marine Life, a global effort to understand the past, present and future of ocean life. The census is due to be completed next year. To reconstruct the state of the oceans centuries and even millennia ago, researchers are combining population modeling techniques with historical records, such as ships' logs, restaurant menus, paintings, diaries, legal documents and even tax returns.

Much of the work presented at the conference concludes that fish stocks were already depleted (大大減少) before the industrial exploitation of the 20th century made the situation even worse. "We used to think mat if we could get fish stocks back up to the levels of the 1970s we would be well on the way to recovery," says Holm. This now seems to be an optimistic idea. James Barrett and Jen Harland of the University of Cambridge reported at the conference that freshwater fisheries in much of Europe were already in decline 1,000 years ago, causing fishers to switch to marine fishing. By 1500, says Maria Lucia De Nicolo of the University of Bologna, Italy, coastal fish stocks were disappearing and deep-sea fishing began. By the early 1800s, the once super abundant European herring fishery had collapsed.

What does this say about the future prospects for marine life? In part the news is

Romance on Campus

It seems that almost every college student has stories of colossal romantic disasters during his or her college years, but there are still some tales of true love that would bring Hollywood calling. There are also some universal truths that those of us who have been through the experience tend to agree on.

So what generalities can be shared about love on the college campus of the twenty-first century? Let's take a look.
