PRELIMINARY READING PASSAGE

I can carry that big red book for you, I think. But we must walk along together, then I can show you the way.

This is a long road. The road you take every evening, when you walk on the river bank, is different.

We must get to the house early enough to talk to all the family, if possible.

I believe the husband is often away. He now works for another company. This means that he gets much more money. His wife hopes soon to live in a big new house in the country and to have a second car for her own use.

Also, their son now goes to another school, which I believe is quite near the sea. This must be good for the boy, as he is not very strong. It is also good for the boy to learn to live away from home and to make a friend of his own age at the school.

My friend and his wife are not sure what to do with their other child when they move house.

The girl still seems very young. She must stop at home with her mother, I think, for at least a year. I feel sure that this is the best thing. I hope so. I do not believe that it is right to put any child into a school far away from the family. Of course, often the child seems to like it very soon.

I hope we are not too late. If we are too late and there is no one in the house when we get there, we can look round the garden before they all return.

You cannot remain at the house all night because the doctor, who is a friend of the family, is there until the morning.

Perhaps my friend can take you back to the town in his new green car after the party.

It is not far now. Look over there and follow me towards the place between that small tree and the low wall.

When we pass that old white horse by the water, we have not far to go.

I am writing a letter

I am writing to you today to say I am glad to learn that father is coming tomorrow. I hope he is catching the early train in the morning.

We do think that he is always happy here, and likes to visit us.

He is meeting a number of friends at a party we are giving very soon after he arrives.

He agrees that it is better to meet the friends and to talk about business after tea, when they come from work.

The neighbours tell me that a man from the garage is taking the car away this afternoon. They want to change it for another. I hope they are buying the right sort of car this time. They wish to use it to go into the country during the summer holidays. They always like to leave the town for a week or two. This year they are taking all the family together. This is quite a problem in a small car!

I believe that you are moving from the hotel. To move is very difficult
