

Inorganic Materials Series

Local Structural Characterisation

Editors

Duncan W. Bruce | Dermot O'Hare | Richard I. Walton

WILEY

Local Structural Characterisation

Edited by

Duncan W. Bruce
University of York, UK

Dermot O'Hare
University of Oxford, UK

Richard I. Walton

University of Warwick, UK

WILEY

This edition first published 2014
© 2014 John Wiley & Sons, Ltd

Registered office

John Wiley & Sons Ltd, The Atrium, Southern Gate, Chichester, West Sussex, PO19 8SQ, United Kingdom

For details of our global editorial offices, for customer services and for information about how to apply for permission to reuse the copyright material in this book please see our website at www.wiley.com.

The right of the author to be identified as the author of this work has been asserted in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, except as permitted by the UK Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, without the prior permission of the publisher.

Wiley also publishes its books in a variety of electronic formats. Some content that appears in print may not be available in electronic books.

Designations used by companies to distinguish their products are often claimed as trademarks. All brand names and product names used in this book are trade names, service marks, trademarks or registered trademarks of their respective owners. The publisher is not associated with any product or vendor mentioned in this book.

Limit of Liability/Disclaimer of Warranty: While the publisher and author have used their best efforts in preparing this book, they make no representations or warranties with respect to the accuracy or completeness of the contents of this book and specifically disclaim any implied warranties of merchantability or fitness for a particular purpose. It is sold on the understanding that the publisher is not engaged in rendering professional services and neither the publisher nor the author shall be liable for damages arising herefrom. If professional advice or other expert assistance is required, the services of a competent professional should be sought.

The advice and strategies contained herein may not be suitable for every situation. In view of ongoing research, equipment modifications, changes in governmental regulations, and the constant flow of information relating to the use of experimental reagents, equipment, and devices, the reader is urged to review and evaluate the information provided in the package insert or instructions for each chemical, piece of equipment, reagent, or device for, among other things, any changes in the instructions or indication of usage and for added warnings and precautions. The fact that an organization or Website is referred to in this work as a citation and/or a potential source of further information does not mean that the author or the publisher endorses the information the organization or Website may provide or recommendations it may make. Further, readers should be aware that Internet Websites listed in this work may have changed or disappeared between when this work was written and when it is read. No warranty may be created or extended by any promotional statements for this work. Neither the publisher nor the author shall be liable for any damages arising herefrom.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Local structural characterisation/edited by Duncan W. Bruce, Dermot O'Hare, Richard I. Walton.
pages cm

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-1-119-95320-3 (cloth)

I. Chemical structure. 2. Materials. I. Bruce, Duncan W., editor of compilation.

II. O'Hare, Dermot, editor of compilation. III. Walton, Richard I., editor of compilation.

QD471.L685 2014

543'.5--dc23

2013015036

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

ISBN: 9781119953203

Set in 10.5/13pt Sabon by Laserwords Private Limited, Chennai, India
Printed and bound in Malaysia by Vivar Printing Sdn Bhd

1 2014

Local Structural Characterisation

Inorganic Materials Series

Series Editors:

Professor Duncan W. Bruce
Department of Chemistry, University of York, UK

Professor Dermot O'Hare
Chemistry Research Laboratory, University of Oxford, UK

Professor Richard I. Walton
Department of Chemistry, University of Warwick, UK

Series Titles

Functional Oxides
Molecular Materials
Porous Materials
Low-Dimensional Solids
Energy Materials
Local Structural Characterisation

Forthcoming Titles

Multi Length-Scale Characterisation
Structure From Diffraction Methods

Inorganic Materials

Series Preface

Back in 1992, two of us (DWB and DO'H) edited the first edition of Inorganic Materials in response to the growing emphasis on and interest in materials chemistry. The second edition, which contained updated chapters, appeared in 1996 and was reprinted in paperback. The aim had always been to provide chapters that while not necessarily comprehensive, nonetheless gave a first-rate and well-referenced introduction to the subject for the first-time reader. As such, the target audience was from first-year postgraduate students upwards. In these two editions, we believe our authors achieved this admirably.

In the intervening years, materials chemistry has grown hugely and it now finds itself central to many of the major challenges that face global society. We felt, therefore, that there was a need for more extensive coverage of the area, and so Richard Walton joined the team and, with Wiley, we set about working on a new and larger project.

The Inorganic Materials Series is the result, and our aim is to provide chapters with a similar pedagogical flavour to the first and second editions, but now with much wider subject coverage. As such, the work will be contained in several volumes. Many of the early volumes concentrate on materials derived from continuous inorganic solids. Later volumes, however, will emphasise methods of characterisation as well as molecular and soft-matter systems, as we aim for a much more comprehensive coverage of the area than was possible with Inorganic Materials.

We are delighted with the calibre of authors who have agreed to write for us and we thank them all for their efforts and cooperation. We believe they have done a splendid job and that their work will make these volumes a valuable reference and teaching resource.

DWB, York
DO'H, Oxford
RIW, Warwick
June 2013

Preface

Inorganic materials show a diverse range of important properties that are desirable for many contemporary, real-world applications. Good examples include recyclable battery cathode materials for energy storage and transport, porous solids for capture and storage of gases and molecular complexes that can be used in electronic devices. Some of these families of materials, and many others, were reviewed in earlier volumes of the Inorganic Materials Series. When considering the property-driven research in this large field, it is immediately apparent that methods for structural characterisation must be applied routinely in order to understand the function of materials and thus optimise their behaviour for real applications. Thus, ‘structure–property relationships’ are an important part of research in this area. To determine structure effectively, advances in methodology are important: the aim is often rapidly to examine increasingly complex materials in order to gain knowledge of structure over length scales ranging from local atomic order, through crystalline, long-range order to the meso- and macroscopic.

No single technique can examine all levels of structural order simultaneously, and the chapters presented in this volume deal with recent advances in important techniques that allow investigation of the structures of inorganic materials on the local atomic scale. Such short-range order is concerned with local atomic structure – the arrangement of atoms in space about a central probe atom – and deals with bond distances, coordination geometry and the local connectivity of the simple building units of a complex structure. It is often by studying this shortest of structural length scales that information about the underlying behaviour of a material can be deduced. The techniques employed are usually spectroscopic in origin, involving observation of the effect of interaction of an appropriate energy source with the substance being studied, which supplies information about the probe atoms’ environments. It should be noted that these methods have no requirement for any long-range order (translational symmetry) and so can be applied equally to poorly crystalline, glassy, amorphous or heterogeneous systems, as well as to crystalline substances. Another consideration of any characterisation study is the need to examine materials under real operating conditions in order to understand properly their function; here, spectroscopic, short-range probes of structure often provide the key.

Some of the techniques discussed in this volume may be familiar to the reader (such as NMR, EPR and XPS), but with recent advances broadening their applicability and making them available more routinely, it is timely to provide up-to-date overviews of their uses. Also included are techniques that require large-scale facilities, such as X-ray absorption spectroscopy (XAS) and inelastic neutron scattering (INS). With the investment by many countries in major facilities for X-ray and neutron science, such methods provide an important, and increasingly accessible, addition to the toolbox of techniques available to the scientist studying the structures of materials. We approached an international set of expert authors to write the chapters in this volume with the brief to provide an introduction to the principles of their technique, to describe recent developments in the field and then to select examples from the literature to illustrate the method under discussion. We believe they have done an excellent job in all respects and hope that the chapters provide a valuable set of references for those who wish to learn the principles of some important methods in the study of inorganic materials.

*DWB, York
DO'H, Oxford
RIW, Warwick
June 2013*

List of Contributors

Sharon E. Ashbrook School of Chemistry, University of St Andrews, St Andrews, UK

Daniel M. Dawson School of Chemistry, University of St Andrews, St Andrews, UK

Pieter Glatzel European Synchrotron Radiation Facility, Grenoble, France

John M. Griffin School of Chemistry, University of St Andrews, St Andrews, UK

Amélie Juhin Institut de Minéralogie et de Physique des Milieux Condensés (IMPMC), CNRS, Pierre-and-Marie-Curie University, Paris, France

Adam F. Lee Department of Chemistry, University of Warwick, Coventry, UK and School of Chemistry, Monash University, Melbourne, Australia

Tomasz Mazur Faculty of Chemistry, Jagiellonian University, Krakow, Poland

Philip C. H. Mitchell Department of Chemistry, University of Reading, Reading, UK

Piotr Pietrzyk Faculty of Chemistry, Jagiellonian University, Krakow, Poland

A. J. Ramirez-Cuesta Neutron Sciences Directorate, Oak Ridge National Laboratory, Oak Ridge, Tennessee, USA and ISIS Facility, Rutherford Appleton Laboratory, STFC, Oxford, UK

Zbigniew Sojka Faculty of Chemistry, Jagiellonian University, Krakow, Poland

Karen Wilson European Bioenergy Research Institute, School of Engineering and Applied Science, Aston University, Aston Triangle, Birmingham, UK

Contents

Inorganic Materials Series Preface	xi
Preface	xiii
List of Contributors	xv
1 Solid-State Nuclear Magnetic Resonance Spectroscopy	1
Sharon E. Ashbrook, Daniel M. Dawson and John M. Griffin
1.1 Overview	1
1.2 Theoretical Background	3
1.2.1 Fundamentals of NMR	3
1.2.2 Acquisition of Basic NMR Spectra	4
1.2.3 Relaxation	7
1.2.4 Interactions in NMR Spectroscopy	7
1.3 Basic Experimental Methods	15
1.3.1 Spin $I = 1/2$ Nuclei	15
1.3.2 Spin $I > 1/2$ Nuclei	24
1.3.3 Wideline NMR Spectroscopy	30
1.4 Calculation of NMR Parameters	31
1.4.1 Introduction to Density Functional Theory	31
1.4.2 Basis Sets and Periodicity	32
1.4.3 Reducing the Computational Cost of Calculations	33
1.4.4 Application of First-Principles Calculations	34
1.5 Applications of Solid-State NMR Spectroscopy	36
1.5.1 Local and Long-Range Structure	36
1.5.2 Measuring Internuclear Interactions	43
1.5.3 Disordered Materials	46
1.5.4 Studying Dynamics	50
1.5.5 Challenging Nuclei and Systems	54
1.5.6 Paramagnetic Materials and Metals	56
1.6 Commonly Studied Nuclei	59
1.6.1 Hydrogen	59
1.6.2 Lithium	61
1.6.3 Boron	62

1.6.4	Carbon	62
1.6.5	Oxygen	62
1.6.6	Fluorine	63
1.6.7	Sodium	63
1.6.8	Aluminium	64
1.6.9	Silicon	64
1.6.10	Phosphorus	64
1.6.11	Xenon	65
1.7	NMR of Materials	65
1.7.1	Simple Ionic Compounds and Ceramics	65
1.7.2	Microporous Materials	67
1.7.3	Minerals and Clays	74
1.7.4	Energy Materials	76
1.7.5	Glasses	78
1.7.6	Polymers	81
1.8	Conclusion	83
	References	84
2	X-ray Absorption and Emission Spectroscopy	89
	Pieter Glatzel and Amélie Juhin
2.1	Introduction: What is Photon Spectroscopy?	89
2.2	Electronic Structure and Spectroscopy	93
2.2.1	Total Energy Diagram	93
2.2.2	Interaction of X-rays with Matter	96
2.3	Calculation of Inner-Shell Spectra	106
2.3.1	The Single-Particle Extended Picture of Electronic States	107
2.3.2	The Many-Body Atomic Picture of Electronic States	109
2.3.3	Comparison of Theoretical Approaches	112
2.3.4	The Many-Body Extended Picture of Electronic States	113
2.3.5	Single-Particle Calculation of the Absorption Cross-Section	114
2.3.6	Many-Body Atomic Calculation of the Cross-Section	118
2.3.7	Which Approach Works Best for Inner-Shell Spectroscopy?	118
2.3.8	Beyond Standard DFT Methods	119

2.4	Experimental Techniques	120
2.4.1	X-ray Absorption Spectroscopy	121
2.4.2	X-ray Raman Scattering Spectroscopy	130
2.4.3	Non-Resonant X-ray Emission (X-ray Fluorescence)	131
2.4.4	Resonant Inelastic X-ray Scattering	137
2.5	Experimental Considerations	155
2.5.1	Modern Sources of X-rays	155
2.5.2	Ultrafast X-ray Spectroscopy	157
2.5.3	Measuring XAS/XES	158
2.6	Conclusion	163
	Acknowledgements	164
	References	164
3	Neutrons and Neutron Spectroscopy	173
	A. J. Ramirez-Cuesta and Philip C. H. Mitchell
3.1	The Neutron and How it is Scattered	174
3.1.1	The Scattering Law	175
3.2	Why Neutrons?	179
3.2.1	The $S(\mathbf{Q}, \omega)$ Map	180
3.2.2	Modelling of INS Spectra	181
3.2.3	Example of the Effects of Sampling of the Brillouin Zone	183
3.2.4	INS Spectrometers	184
3.2.5	Measurement Temperature	189
3.2.6	Amount of Sample Required	189
3.3	Molecular Hydrogen (Dihydrogen) in Porous Materials	190
3.3.1	The Rotational Spectrum of Dihydrogen	190
3.3.2	The Polarising Power of Cations and H_2 Binding	191
3.3.3	Hydrogen in Metal Organic Frameworks	195
3.3.4	Hydrogen Trapped in Clathrates	198
3.4	INS and Catalysis	201
3.4.1	Hydroxyl Groups on Surfaces	206
3.5	CO_2 and SO_2 Capture	207
3.6	What Could be Next?	211
3.6.1	How Could We Improve INS?	211
3.6.2	A Hypothetical INS Instrument for Catalysis	216
3.7	Conclusion	219
	References	220

4	Electron Paramagnetic Resonance Spectroscopy of Inorganic Materials	225
	Piotr Pietrzyk, Tomasz Mazur and Zbigniew Sojka
4.1	Introduction	225
4.2	Electron Spin in a Magnetic Field	226
4.2.1	Electron Zeeman Effect and the Resonance Phenomenon	228
4.2.2	Spin Relaxation	230
4.2.3	Electron–Nucleus Hyperfine Interaction	233
4.2.4	EPR Spectrometers	238
4.2.5	Samples, Sample Holders and Registration of EPR Spectra	242
4.3	Spin Hamiltonian and Symmetry	244
4.3.1	The g Tensor	244
4.3.2	The Hyperfine A Tensor	250
4.3.3	The Fine Structure D Tensor	256
4.3.4	The Quadrupole Q Tensor	260
4.3.5	Electron–Electron Exchange Interactions J	261
4.3.6	The Spin Hamiltonian	264
4.4	Principal Types of EPR Spectrum and Their Characteristic Features	267
4.4.1	Single-Crystal Spectra	267
4.4.2	Static and Dynamic Disorder	269
4.4.3	EPR Spectra of Powder and Nanopowder Materials	274
4.4.4	Unusual Spectral Features	278
4.4.5	Computer Simulation of Powder Spectra	280
4.5	Advanced EMR Techniques	282
4.5.1	High-Field and Multifrequency EPR	282
4.5.2	Pulsed EPR Methods	285
	References	296
5	Analysis of Functional Materials by X-ray Photoelectron Spectroscopy	301
	Karen Wilson and Adam F. Lee
5.1	Introduction	301
5.1.1	The Basic Principles of XPS	302
5.1.2	Quantification of X-ray Photoelectron Spectra	305
5.1.3	The Origin of Surface Sensitivity	308

5.1.4	Angular Resolved XPS	309
5.1.5	Chemical Shift Information from XPS	311
5.2	Imaging XPS	315
5.3	Time-Resolved High-Resolution XPS	318
5.3.1	Selective Catalytic Alcohol Oxidation	319
5.3.2	Selective Oxidation of Allylic Alcohols	322
5.3.3	C–X Activation	324
5.4	High- or Ambient-Pressure XPS	326
5.4.1	AP-XPS Studies of the Surface Chemistry of Oxidised Metal Surfaces	329
5.4.2	Selective Hydrogenation	333
5.4.3	HP-XPS Studies of Core–Shell Nanoparticulate Materials	335
5.5	Applications to Inorganic Materials	335
5.5.1	Bimetallic Nanoparticles	335
5.5.2	XPS Studies of Heteropolytungstate Clusters	338
5.5.3	XPS Studies of Acid–Base Sites in Oxide Catalysts	342
5.6	Conclusion	345
	References	345
	Index	351

1

Solid-State Nuclear Magnetic Resonance Spectroscopy

Sharon E. Ashbrook, Daniel M. Dawson and John M. Griffin

School of Chemistry, University of St Andrews, St Andrews, UK

1.1 OVERVIEW

Although solution-state nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) spectroscopy is one of the most widely applied analytical tools in chemistry, providing a sensitive probe of local structure for systems ranging from small molecules to large proteins, it is only relatively recently that solid-state NMR has been able to provide information of a similar quality. The anisotropic (i.e. orientation-dependent) interactions affecting NMR spectra, which ultimately provide valuable information about structure, symmetry and bonding, are averaged in solution by the rapid tumbling motion of the molecules, resulting in simplified spectra from which information can be more easily obtained. In contrast, NMR spectra of solids remain broadened by these interactions, hindering the extraction of structural information. This broadening poses significant challenges both in the acquisition of high-resolution NMR spectra for solids and in their interpretation and analysis. However, in recent years considerable developments in hardware (e.g. increasing magnetic field strengths) and in software (e.g. improvements in computational simulations and analysis packages) have enabled solid-state NMR to develop to the point where it can play a central role in the atomic-level understanding of materials as diverse as zeolites, glasses, polymers, energy materials, pharmaceuticals and proteins.

The ability of NMR spectroscopy to probe the local atomic-scale environment, without any requirement for long- or short-range order, enables it to be used alongside more conventional diffraction-based approaches for the study of solids. The sensitivity of NMR to small changes in the local environment (and its element specificity) makes it an ideal approach for studying disorder in solids, be it positional or compositional, resulting in numerous applications to the study of glasses, gels and ceramics. NMR is also an excellent probe of dynamics, sensitive to motion over a wide range of timescales, depending upon the exact experiment used. However, despite this wealth of information, the interpretation of solid-state NMR spectra and the extraction of relevant structural detail remain a challenge. In recent years there has been growing interest in the use of computational methods alongside experimental measurement. While there has been a long tradition in quantum chemistry of the calculation of NMR parameters from first principles, much of the development has been focused on molecules (either in vacuum or in solution), rather than on the extended and periodic structures found in the solid state. Recent methods utilising periodic approaches to recreate the three-dimensional (3D) structure from a high-symmetry small-volume unit have found great favour with experimentalists, and are currently being applied to a wide range of different systems, helping to interpret complex NMR spectra, improve structural models and provide new insight into disorder and/or dynamics.

At first sight, the vast array of NMR experiments in the literature can seem daunting to the non-specialist; however they can be easily categorised by their overall aim. Many experiments are designed to improve resolution and/or sensitivity, typically through more efficient removal of anisotropic broadening – an enduring theme in solid-state NMR spectroscopy. Experiments have also been developed to measure the magnitudes of individual interactions, providing information on local geometry or symmetry, for example. Further experiments are concerned with the transfer of magnetisation between different nuclei, probing their through-bond or through-space connectivity. In many cases, the exact experimental detail is not of vital importance; it is more useful to understand the type of information available from a particular NMR spectrum and how it can be extracted. In this chapter, we will give an overview of solid-state NMR spectroscopy, focusing in particular upon its application to inorganic solids. We briefly introduce the theoretical basis of the technique and the interactions that affect NMR spectra (and ultimately provide information). We describe the basic and routinely used experimental techniques, and the information that is available from solid-state NMR spectra. We then review the nuclear species most commonly studied and provide a range of examples of the application of NMR spectroscopy for a wide variety of materials, demonstrating the versatility and promise of the technique.

1.2 THEORETICAL BACKGROUND

A brief description of the theoretical basis of NMR spectroscopy is provided here. For a detailed description, see references [1, 2].

1.2.1 Fundamentals of NMR

Atomic nuclei possess an intrinsic spin angular momentum, \mathbf{I} , described by the nuclear spin quantum number, I , which may take any positive integer or half-integer value. The projection of \mathbf{I} onto a specified axis, arbitrarily the z -axis, is quantised in units of $m_I \hbar$, where m_I is the magnetic quantum number, and takes values between $+I$ and $-I$ in integer steps, leading to $2I + 1$ degenerate spin states. Nuclei with $I > 0$ possess a magnetic dipole moment, $\boldsymbol{\mu}$, related to \mathbf{I} by the gyromagnetic ratio, γ , which is characteristic of a given nuclide. Therefore, $\boldsymbol{\mu}$ is quantised along the (arbitrary) z -axis in units of $\gamma m_I \hbar$. When an external magnetic field, B_0 , is present, the axis of quantisation is defined and the degeneracy of the nuclear spin states is removed. The field-induced splitting of nuclear energy levels is known as the Zeeman interaction, with the Zeeman energy of a state, m_I , given by:

$$E_{m_I} = -\gamma m_I \hbar B_0 \quad (1.1)$$

as shown in Figure 1.1. Only transitions with $\Delta m_I = \pm 1$ are observable in NMR spectroscopy and, therefore, all observable transitions are degenerate, with a frequency:

$$\omega_0 = -\gamma B_0 \quad (1.2)$$ where ω_0 is the Larmor frequency, with units of rad s^{-1} (or $\nu_0 = \omega_0/2\pi$, in Hz). In a macroscopic sample at thermal equilibrium, nuclei occupy energy levels according to the Boltzmann distribution. The equilibrium