ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The data gathering phase, as well as some of the analysis of my research on rape and child sexual abuse, was funded by the National Institute of Mental Health (grant R01MH 28960). A more extensive analysis of the interviews on child sexual abuse was funded by the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect (grant 90-CA-813/01). I am very grateful to both agencies for recognizing the merits of this research and for funding it. Without their support this project would have been an impossible undertaking.

The findings of this NIMH- and NCCAN-funded research are cited extensively throughout this book. I am therefore indebted to the hundreds of people who have contributed to this and prior research—and to my thinking—since I started work on the subject of rape in 1971. Over 150 people were individually acknowledged in my book Rape in Marriage for their participation in the survey research project for which I was the principal investigator. Although I cannot name each of them here, I would like to thank them again collectively, with special mention of those who have been particularly helpful in the process of writing this book.

First, I'd like to thank Brooke Allison for selecting me to be the expert consultant for the California Commission on Crime Control and Violence Prevention in August 1981. The final report that I wrote for that commission became the first draft of this book.

Many of the people who were helpful to me in the preparation of that report have thereby also contributed to the creation of this book. These people include Shela Brooks, Sandra Butler, Cheryl Colopy, Phyllis Crocker, David Finkelhor, Grace Hardgrove, Abigail Hemstreet, Pat Loomes, Catherine MacKinnon, Kee MacFarlane, and Richard Snowden. In particular I'd like to thank Kee MacFarlane for her considerable help with the section on child sexual abuse, and for her general support and encouragement of my work on sexual abuse. I am also grateful to Catherine MacKinnon for many useful conversations, for informing me about a key study on sexual harassment, and for encouraging me to publish the report.

David Finkelhor, one of my most valued colleagues, has been of great assistance in a number of ways. First, I have organized my entire discussion of the causes of rape, child sexual abuse, and sexual harassment within a framework that his work provided. Second, after reading my final report he encouraged me to revise and publish it, and he played a key role in its publication by Sage. I would also like to thank Mildred Pagelow (who suggested the title of the book) and Ann Maney, Director of the Rape Center at NIMH, for their endorsement of the merits of my final report to Sage.

I am extremely grateful to Karen Trocki, the data analyst on this project, for her indispensable role in all phases and aspects of the quantitative analysis. She has been serving this vital function for four years now, and I truly don't know what I would do without her skill, as well as her thorough knowledge and understanding of my complex data base. Karen also plotted all the graphs included in this book, wrote the first draft of the section comparing the respondents in my survey with the 1980 Census data for San Francisco, and other segments on the methodology of my study.

I am also indebted to Nancy Howell for her assistance with the demographic analysis of the trends in rape and child sexual abuse over time, to Bill Wells for his contribution as the computer programmer, and to Eda Regan, the reference librarian at Mills College, for her willingness to try to find the answers to the many often difficult questions I have brought to her.

Many others have helped me in numerous ways with this research—sometimes by making useful suggestions on drafts of particular chapters, sometimes by discussing important theoretical issues with me, and sometimes by offering encouragement. These people include Constance Backhouse, Judith Herman, Jane Loebel, Michelle Morris, Patricia Mrazak, Pat Phelan, and Sue Saperstein.

I am intellectually indebted to many different people for their research, writing, or thinking on the subjects of rape or child sexual abuse. Some of these people will become obvious to the reader, because of the frequency with which I cite their work. In particular, I would like to acknowledge my indebtedness to Susan Brownmiller, Lucy Berliner, David Finkelhor, Judith Herman, Kee MacFarlane, Florence Rush, and Roland Summit. I also wish to thank Sedelle Katz and Mary Ann Mazur for their invaluable synthesis of research findings in their book Understanding the Rape Victim. Their thorough review of the research literature on many aspects of rape made my task significantly easier.

I am grateful to Marny Hall not only for her encouragement but also for introducing me to her editor, Meredith Maran Graham. Every writer
