Introductory Note

The purpose of this compact little book is to help the reader to communicate easily with Chinese-speaking people. Its uniqueness is the numerical order in which it is arranged. An Arabic number is attached to each word—always the same number for the respective word no matter in which section of the book it is found. English is alphabetized, while Chinese is indexed according to the number of strokes. The transliteration follows the official Romanization with the pronunciation accents for Mandarin.

The underlying idea is not to “computerize.” It is that numbers are the only existent international “language” (to a certain degree musical notation also has this quality) used almost uniformly all over the world. This method is especially appropriate for the Chinese language which, with its highly complicated system of character strokes instead of an alphabet, is difficult even for linguists to master. Not knowing a single stroke of Chinese writing or the idiosyncrasies of the four-tone pronunciation (which practically only a native is able to grasp), one has simply to follow the number attached to the word and thereby find the meaning of the word with its approximate transliteration.

The book can be used with equal ease by any Chinese, although it is based on the official Mandarin language. Universality of the stroke signs and of the numbers attached to each word in this book makes this possible.

Limitation of the vocabulary to 1000 words follows the pioneering work of C. K. Ogden's "Basic English," with its 850 most frequently used words; additional selections were based on studies of word frequency computations, especially for travelers. One thousand words surpasses the vocabulary used by educated people in daily life.
