

CHINATOWN in BRITAIN

Diffusions and Concentrations of the British New Wave Chinese Immigration

Wai-ki E. Luk

D634.2t6.1

E 2101

华
文

华人中心

CHINATOWN IN BRITAIN

Diffusions and Concentrations of the British New Wave Chinese Immigration

Wai-ki E. Luk

CAMBRIA
PRESS

YOUNGSTOWN, NEW YORK

Copyright 2008 Wai-ki Luk

All rights reserved

Printed in the United States of America

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in or introduced into a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form, or by any means (electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise), without the prior permission of the publisher. Requests for permission should be directed to permissions@cambriapress.com, or mailed to Permissions, Cambria Press, PO Box 350, Youngstown, New York 14174-0350.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Luk, Wai-ki, 1976—

Chinatown in Britain : diffusions and concentrations of the British New Wave Chinese immigration / Wai-ki E. Luk.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 978-1-934043-86-8 (alk. paper)

1. Chinese—Great Britain. 2. Chinese—Great Britain—Social conditions—20th century. 3. Chinese—Great Britain—Social conditions—21st century. 4. China—Emigration and immigration—History—20th century. 5. China—Emigration and immigration—History—21st century. I. Title.

DA125.C5L85 2007

304.8'41051—dc22

2007028767

D634-316

E 2407

1-1-50

CHINATOWN

IN BRITAIN

CHINATOWN IN BRITAIN

Diffusion and Concentrations of the British New Wave
Chinese Immigration

WILLIAM H. H. H. H.

1954

CAMBRIDGE
PRESS

Yale University Press

TABLE OF CONTENTS

List of Tables	xi
List of Figures	xii
List of Plates	xiii
Preface	xviii
Acknowledgments	xxvii
Introduction	1
Towards a Study	1
of Chinese Social Geographies	1
Defining "Chinese" and "Chinatown"	3
Structure of the Book	9
Chapter 1: Data and Methods	13
Data Sources	13
Methods and Procedures	21
Chapter 2: Chinese Diaspora in Great Britain	37
Chinese Diaspora and the Chinese Diasporism	37
of Overseas Chinese	38
Old Diaspora	45
New Diaspora	51
Immigrant Diaspora	51
of the Diasporic Community	61

PREFACE

The 1980s saw the beginning of a major transformation in Chinese immigration to Great Britain, and indeed in that of many other countries. It is a transformation which is still going on. In Britain, the scale of ethnic Chinese growth has been so recent and rapid that its population rose from just over 12,000 in 1951 to nearly 250,000 in 2001. Beginning in the early 1980s there has been a substantial increase in and diversity of Chinese immigrants. This new wave immigration is characterised by Chinese not only from Hong Kong but also from China, Taiwan, and Southeast Asia. Some have come as first-time immigrants or remigrants, others as students, and still others as refugees and illegal immigrants. The regular channels contain family reunification, work-permit or short-term work contracts, business investments, education, and the need for specialists (including qualified nurses and Chinese cooks); whereas the irregular channels contain human trafficking or overstaying a visa.

Many of these changes occurred as a result of the fundamental restructuring of the political and economic environments in both sending and receiving countries. In China, emigration is a political consequence of the government's shift towards more liberal emigration policies. With China's progressive integration into the world's economy, emigration is increasingly seen as a political and as an individual right. In Hong Kong and many of the Southeast Asian countries, emigration is a response to perceived political and social instability. In Britain, Chinese immigration is seen as an economic consideration subject to the cyclical fluctuations in demand for labour. Immigrants were admitted when they were useful and excluded when they were perceived as no longer useful. In this respect, the Chinese experience is similar to that of the Caribbeans and South Asians: They were admitted as a replacement labour force in response to the postwar economic recovery but subsequently excluded by restrictive immigrant laws (Peach, 1966). The closed labour market was, however, reopened in the 1990s to the highly skilled Chinese immigrants to meet skill shortages and to increase the competitiveness of the British economy.

Notwithstanding this immigration history, there is an implicit and often explicit tendency to view Chinese immigrants in a negative light. The media has unfailingly recycled the myth of the "un-British" nature of the Chinese, who entered without changing their way of life to suit British social expectations. As early as 1977, Watson argued that the Chinese are the least assimilated among the various ethnic minorities in Britain. An extension of this same myth is the view that Chinese immigrants are "somewhat isolated and certainly unobtrusive, and yet anything but "invisible" (Freeberne, 1981, p. 707). This voluntaristic separateness from members of the host society has been documented in the literature (e.g., see Tam, 1998). All these myths draw attention to the white perception that the Chinese are seen as a silent minority because they are concentrated in Chinatowns, and therefore, they are separated from the host society. Culturally and socioeconomically, the Chinese prefer self-help and do not need the intervention of social services, nor do they compete for jobs with members of the host society. Associated with this is their strong representation in the restaurant sector, where waiters, cooks, and kitchen helpers have to work the long and unsocial hours that the trade requires (Holmes, 1988; Parker, 1994). This voluntary self-isolation, at residence and/or workplace, created a stereotype of an inability to assimilate, that in turn reinforced the community's irrelevance to the larger society.

Such thinking is entirely credible, but it appears to deny much of the reality that the Chinese in Britain are heterogeneous; that different Chinese populations have different premigratory experiences, demographic profiles, and educational qualifications; that place of origin affects socioeconomic attainment and spatial integration. Underlying this strong subethnic difference is the fact that the Chinese are pursuing different modes of integration in the British social geography. In view of this, Chinatown not only functions as a primary reception area for newcomers, it also distributes old-timers and replicates its port of entry function across the British space. What we have seen in recent decades is that the Chinese have been rapidly changing the face of the British urban landscapes. We have seen the continued existence of traditional Chinatowns; we have also seen the development of suburban Chinatowns and new forms of Chinese settlement (Li, 1998; Li, Dymiski, Zhou, Chee, & Aldana, 2002).

The fact that this book is being written about ethnic settlement and integration implies that there is a kind of relationship between them. For some 80 years since Park's (1926) revolutionary idea of the physical analysis of social relations in spatial terms, we have known from most productive empirical work that social and spatial changes are intimately interwoven: A high degree of spatial integration is indicative of social integration. But surprisingly, in the Chinese case, shifts of physical space and their social implications have received little attention from British social geographers. How do we understand the settlement patterns of the (sub)ethnic Chinese population in Britain? What is the relationship between social distance and spatial distribution in this new wave of Chinese immigration? It is against this background that this study is carried out.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

So many scores of persons assisted in this book, wittingly and unwittingly, that I shall never fully be able to acknowledge the appreciation I owe and feel. My dissertation, British New Wave Chinese Immigration, from which the present work is adapted, was supervised by Ceri Peach of the University of Oxford. I am deeply indebted to him for his intellectual guidance and constant encouragement. My sincere thanks must go to Wolfgang Taubmann of the University of Bremen, who was among the first to support my aspirations in undertaking this study. Extra thanks go to Yok-shiu Lee and C.Y. Jim of the University of Hong Kong for their sage advice and wisdom during the long course of writing and research. As always, I benefited greatly from the intellectual stimulation and wonderful friendship of Paul Cheng, who saw my research potential and challenged me to make it better.

For practical help, I owe special debts to Nigel James of Bodleian Library Map Room, who helped shape this book with his cartographic assistance. I am particularly grateful to Raya Muttarak and Sandra Liu for spending much time and energy on preparing my data. High praise also goes to Sunny Lam for his technical support. Their patience was invaluable.

Thanks are due to the following individuals for their illuminating insights and words of encouragement: Ricky Chan, Norman Cheung, Denise Pang, Sharon Wong, Sue Bird, Dickei Kwan, and Fong-ling Wong. My thanks also go to Mark Chan and Andrew Lowe. Without their exceptional dedication, attention to detail, intellectual rigor, and constructive criticism on earlier drafts of this book, this study would never have been completed. Needless to say, the viewpoints expressed here and any mistakes made are my own.

I was aided immeasurably by members of the Chinatown community. Their inspired discussions and rigorous criticism were incalculable. Particular acknowledgement must be given to those who agreed to be formally interviewed and those who spoke to me informally as well.

Finally, the completion of this book would not have been possible without the incredible support of and indispensable understanding from Christina Fu and my family. I am more grateful than I can say.

INTRODUCTION

CHINATOWN IN BRITAIN

The focus of this book is on a Chinese immigration to the past century, and its social implications in Britain. A main argument I make in this book is that if the Chinese can be regarded as a turning point in the history of Chinese immigration to Britain because the decade marked a significant change in the way the Chinese immigrants were perceived by the British, it is not because of the Chinese immigrants, but because of the British. A century ago, the Chinese were regarded as a threat to the British, and a source of social and economic problems. But by the end of the century, the Chinese were regarded as a source of economic and social benefits. This change in perception was the result of a number of factors, including the Chinese immigrants' own efforts, the British government's policies, and the British public's changing attitudes. The Chinese immigrants' own efforts were to establish themselves in Britain, and to contribute to the British economy and society. The British government's policies were to encourage the Chinese immigrants, and to provide them with the necessary support. The British public's changing attitudes were to see the Chinese immigrants as a source of economic and social benefits, rather than as a threat.

THE CHINESE IMMIGRATION TO BRITAIN IN THE PAST CENTURY

THE CHINESE IMMIGRATION TO BRITAIN IN THE PAST CENTURY

The Chinese immigration to Britain in the past century has been a significant event in the history of the Chinese diaspora. It has been a process of migration that has been shaped by a number of factors, including the Chinese immigrants' own efforts, the British government's policies, and the British public's changing attitudes. The Chinese immigrants' own efforts were to establish themselves in Britain, and to contribute to the British economy and society. The British government's policies were to encourage the Chinese immigrants, and to provide them with the necessary support. The British public's changing attitudes were to see the Chinese immigrants as a source of economic and social benefits, rather than as a threat.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

List of Tables	xi
List of Figures	xx
List of Plates	xxiv
Preface	xxvii
Acknowledgments	xxxii
Introduction	1
Towards a Study
of Chinese Social Geographies	1
Defining “Chinese” and “Chinatown”	5
Structure of the Book	9
Chapter 1: Data and Methods	13
Data Sources	14
Methods and Procedures	21
Chapter 2: Chinese Diaspora in Great Britain	37
Chinese Diaspora and the Global Distribution
of Overseas Chinese	38
Old Diaspora	45
New Diaspora	50
Invisible Members
of the Diasporic Community	61

Diversified Origins	67
Conclusion	73
Chapter 3: The Life, Death, and Life of Chinatowns	75
Chinatowns in White Perception	77
A Cycle of Change	83
Emergence and Development of British Chinatowns and Chinese Settlements	96
Chinatown Reoriented: Retrospect and Prospect	120
Conclusion	125
Chapter 4: The Chinese Geographies: Distribution, Structure, and Change	127
The Chinese Geographies: A White-Market Distribution	128
Chinese Urban Hierarchy and Rank-Size Distribution	146
Conclusion	169
Chapter 5: Ethnic Residential Mobility and Segregation	171
Together or Apart? A Brief Review on Ethnic Segregation and Assimilation	172
Chinese Residential Segregation Patterns in London, Manchester, and Birmingham	180
British Model of Chinese Segregation in Comparative Perspective	199
Summary of the Distributional Evidence	202

Chapter 6: Subethnic Differences in Settlement Patterns	207
Part I: Subethnic Chinese Immigration to Great Britain	208
Situating Subethnic Chinese	208
Structural Change in Chinese Immigration	213
Part II: Subethnic Chinese Settlement Patterns	239
Assimilationist and Pluralist Models of Subethnic Chinese Settlements	239
Intergenerational Differences in Chinese Settlement Patterns	258
Conclusion: The Chinese Salad Bowl	270
Chapter 7: Conclusion: The Future of Chinese Geographies	273
Chinese Immigration and Settlements: A Summary	274
A British Model of Chinese Settlements	277
The Challenge Ahead: Rising Out of Chinatown?	283
Appendices	295
Appendix A: The Chinese Geographies: Distribution, Structure, and Change	295
Appendix B: Ethnic Residential Mobility and Segregation	300

Appendix C: Subethnic Differences in Settlement Patterns	306
Notes	317
Bibliography	327
Index	349

LIST OF TABLES

Table 2.1. Distribution of overseas Chinese in Southeast Asia, 1990 and 1997.	42
Table 2.2. Distribution of overseas Chinese in Western Europe, 1990 and 1997.	43
Table 2.3. Distribution of overseas Chinese in North America and Oceania, 1990 and 1997.	44
Table 2.4. Growth of Chinese in Britain, 1851–2001.	47
Table 2.5. Ethnic composition in Britain, 1991 and 2001.	52
Table 2.6. Asian immigrants by selected country/place of birth, 1951–1991.	60
Table 2.7. Chinese by place of birth, 1991 and 2001.	72
Table 3.1. Population by ethnicity in St. James Ward and Borough of City of Westminster, 1991 and 2001.	85
Table 3.2. Gini coefficients by selected ethnic groups at ward and OA levels in London, Manchester, and Birmingham, 2001.	89