

An abstract painting of a face wearing glasses. The face is composed of various colors including blue, purple, red, and green, with visible brushstrokes. The glasses are dark and have a simple frame. The background is a mix of these colors, creating a textured and expressive effect.

Third Edition

LITERARY CRITICISM

an introduction to theory and practice

Charles E. Bressler

LITERARY CRITICISM

An Introduction to Theory and Practice

Third Edition

Charles E. Bressler

Houghton College

Upper Saddle River, New Jersey 07458

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Bressler, Charles E.

Literary criticism : an introduction to theory and practice / Charles E. Bressler.— 3rd ed.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

1. Criticism. I. Title.

PN81 .B666 2002

801'.95—dc21

2002074510

Once again, for Darlene, my best friend and loving wife, and Heidi, my much loved daughter

VP, Editor-in-Chief: Leah Jewell

Senior Acquisitions Editor: Carrie Brandon

Editorial Assistant: Jennifer Migueis

VP, Director of Production and Manufacturing: Barbara Kittle

Senior Managing Editor: Ann Marie McCarthy

Senior Production Editor: Shelly Kupperman

Prepress and Manufacturing Manager: Nick Sklitsis

Prepress and Manufacturing Buyer: Sherry Lewis

Director of Marketing: Beth Mejia

Senior Marketing Manager: Rachel Falk

Marketing Assistant: Christine Moodie

Cover Design Director: Robert Farrar-Wagner

Cover Art: Theodore J. Murphy, "Before the Fall," 2001, oil, 10" × 11".

For permission to use copyrighted material, grateful acknowledgment is made to the copyright holders listed on pages 312–313, which are considered an extension of this copyright page.

This book is set in 10/12 Palatino and was printed and bound by Courier Companies, Inc.

The cover was printed by The Lehigh Press, Inc.

© 2003, 1999, 1994 by Pearson Education, Inc.
Upper Saddle River, New Jersey 07458

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, in any form or by any means, without permission in writing from the publisher.

Printed in the United States of America

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

ISBN: 0-13-033397-2

Pearson Education LTD., London

Pearson Education Australia PTY, Limited, Sydney

Pearson Education Singapore, Pte. Ltd

Pearson Education North Asia Ltd, Hong Kong

Pearson Education Canada, Ltd., Toronto

Pearson Educación de Mexico, S.A. de C.V.

Pearson Education – Japan, Tokyo

Pearson Education Malaysia, Pte. Ltd

Pearson Education, Upper Saddle River, New Jersey

Foreword

Early in Mark Twain's The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, we learn about Tom Sawyer's gang and his "deep laid" plans, for Tom and his inner circle of friends dedicate one memorable occasion to working out such details: the name of the gang, its objectives, its general line of business—its modus operandi. But there are problems, namely, problems of interpretation. After all, not everybody defines "gang" the same way. These interpretive problems are not insurmountable, so we discover, but they are real, at least for a few enchanted moments in the narrative:

"Now," says Ben Rogers, "what's the line of business of this Gang?"

"Nothing only robbery and murder," Tom said.

"But who are we going to rob?—houses, or cattle, or—"

"Stuff! stealing cattle and such things ain't robbery; it's burglary," says Tom Sawyer. "We ain't burglars. That ain't no sort of style. We are highwaymen. We stop stages and carriages on the road, with masks on, and kill the people and take their watches and money."

"Must we always kill the people?"

"Oh, certainly. It's best. Some authorities think different, but mostly it's considered best to kill them—except some that you bring to the cave here, and keep them till they're ransomed."

"Ransomed? What's that?"

"I don't know. But that's what they do. I've seen it in books; and so of course that's what we've got to do."

"But how can we do it if we don't know what it is?"

"Why, blame it all, we've got to do it. Don't I tell you it's in the books? Do you want to go to doing different from what's in the books, and get things all muddled up?"

It is difficult to argue that Tom Sawyer, under any circumstances, is a reliable reader of literary texts. Yet amidst this already "muddled up" but delightfully humorous conversation, Tom is right about one thing: books carry a certain cultural authority. They can and do influence the way a person understands human experience, even if that same person makes no claim to be an avid reader. Tom Sawyer is certainly not the model reader, nor was he ever the model student. But his cocksure knowledge of books, however boyishly obtained, is telling nonetheless.

Readers are still intensely interested in understanding “what’s in the books.” It is a task, in fact, made all the richer and at the same time more difficult, given the great variety of critical approaches to literary texts, and the decades of theoretical debates, political wrangling, and culture wars. In her book West of Everything, Jane Tompkins has accurately described such conflicts in the discipline as “academic shootouts” (230). Even in the late afternoon of theory, however, the dust has not settled. Terry Eagleton’s admonition is as true now as it was when he first offered it: “Hostility to theory usually means an opposition to other people’s theories and an oblivion of one’s own” (Literary Theory, viii). But just what constitutes “theory” and its various uses is still a hotly debated subject, yet one worth pursuing.

Not all critics share Eagleton’s views on the subject. Denis Donoghue asserts, “If theory is merely experimental or, as we say, heuristic, we do well to take it to mind if not to heart, and give it a run for whatever money we risk on it. But if it is offered to us as a creed or a vision or a doctrine, we should approach it much more skeptically and estimate the consequence of taking it to heart and soul.” In Shakespearean criticism, for instance, Donoghue contends that Eagleton’s commitments to “theory” have amounted to what he calls a “New Thematics”: the “queering” of “one discipline—literary criticism—with the habits of another—social science or moral interrogation” (The Practice of Reading 66–67). This one tension is only representative of the many that exist in response to “what’s in the books,” that persistent question.

Charles Bressler’s Literary Criticism, Third Edition, invites readers not only into the debate but also into the larger literary conversation. Like the two previous editions, this one is written on the assumption that too often literary theory is a subject only for professional critics and academicians. While this new edition makes it even more possible for students to work with complex theoretical configurations, it is not at all phobic about literary power. Bressler’s goal is to introduce students to the practice of literary reading in all its variety, not to indoctrinate.

Chapter 1 addresses two of the most central questions in the college literature classroom: How we read and why? To help students answer these questions, Bressler provides a working definition of literature, including its epistemological and ontological components. His discussion also attempts to relate literary study to the relationship between public and private values.

Chapter 2 traces the historical developments of literary criticism, from Plato to the present. This chapter is designed to help students relate to and participate in the historical debate about such important subjects as representation, truth, beauty, nature, form, meaning, gender, class, and audience, among others. Chapter 2 explores some of the important early influences on what is now modern and postmodern literary theory. What is important about this chapter is that it alerts students to the intellectual risks of developing a merely contemporary diet of ideas.

Chapters 3 through 11 of Literary Criticism, Third Edition, investigate the main critical “schools” that have developed to the present: respectively, New Criticism, Reader-Response Criticism, Structuralism, Deconstruction, Psychoanalytic Criticism, Feminism, Marxism, Cultural Poetics (or New Historicism), and Cultural Studies, which has been expanded to include a more detailed discussion of Postcolonialism.

Literary Criticism, Third Edition, is designed to equip teachers and students to enter into a more meaningful conversation about literary texts. To this end, this revised edition includes a new, updated glossary of critical terms, new student essays, an updated bibliography, and a list of useful Web sites and links. The Internet listings will provide students new and exciting avenues for literary research. All of the revisions to the new edition are intended to help students sharpen their critical thinking skills and develop a voice in critical discussions. To enable students to become more informed readers of literature, the third edition also includes a Questions for Analysis section at the end of each chapter. This section reinforces the point that all good research writing and discussion begins with one good, well-focused question.

It is not the goal of this book to substitute for any important primary readings. Instead, this text intends to engage students in a series of mutual introductions to primary and secondary works in literary studies. It is hoped that students then will decide “what’s in the books,” with the added awareness that it is only through rereading them over a lifetime that makes answers even possible.

Daniel H. Strait
Asbury College
Wilmore, Kentucky

To the Reader

Like the first two editions, this new edition of Literary Criticism is designed as a supplemental text for introductory courses in both literature and literary criticism. In all three editions, the purpose of this text has always remained the same: to enable students to approach literature from a variety of practical and theoretical perspectives and to equip them with a theoretical and a practical understanding of how critics develop their interpretations. Its overall aim is to take the mystery out of working with and interpreting texts.

Like the first and second editions, the third edition holds to several key premises. First, I assume that there is no such thing as an “innocent” reading of a text. Whether our responses to a text are emotional and spontaneous or well reasoned and highly structured, all of our interpretations are based on underlying factors that cause us to respond in a particular way. What elicits these responses, and how a reader makes sense out of a text, is what really matters. It is the domain of literary theory to question our initial and all our further responses, our beliefs, our values, our feelings, and our eventual, overall interpretation. To understand why we respond to a text in a certain way, we must first understand literary theory and criticism.

Second, since our responses to any text have theoretical bases, I presume that all readers have a literary theory. Consciously or unconsciously, as readers we have developed a mind-set that fits or encompasses our expectations when reading any text. Somehow we all seem able to make sense of a text. The methods we use to frame our personal and public interpretations directly involve us in the process of literary criticism and theory and automatically make us practicing literary critics, whether we know it or not!

My third assumption rests on the observation that each reader’s literary theory and accompanying methodology is either conscious or unconscious, complete or incomplete, informed or ill-informed, eclectic or unified. Since an unconscious, incomplete, ill-informed, and eclectic literary theory more frequently than not leads to illogical, unsound, and haphazard interpretations, I believe that a well-defined, logical, and clearly articulated theory will enable readers to develop their own methods of interpretation, permitting readers, in fact, to order, clarify, and justify their appraisals of a text in a consistent and rational manner.

Unfortunately, many readers cannot articulate their own literary theory and have little knowledge of the history and development of the ever-evolving principles of literary criticism. It is the goal of this book to introduce such students to literary theory and criticism, its historical development, and the various theoretical positions or schools of criticism that will enable them as readers to make conscious, informed, and intelligent choices about their own methods of interpretation.

Like the first two editions, this new edition introduces students to the basic concerns of literary theory in Chapter 1, which now includes a more expansive definition of literature itself. Chapter 2 places literary theory and criticism in historical perspective, starting with Plato and ending with modern-day theorists. Chapters 3 to 11 have all been revised, adding new terminology where appropriate. These chapters present the eleven major schools of criticism that have been developed in the twentieth century: New Criticism, Reader-Response Criticism, Structuralism, Deconstruction, Psychoanalytic Criticism, Feminism, Marxism, Cultural Poetics or New Historicism, and Cultural Studies, with an expanded discussion of Postcolonialism, including African American and Gender Studies. To maintain consistency and for ease of study, each of these chapters is identically organized. We begin with a brief Introduction followed by the Historical Development of each school of criticism. The Assumptions section, which sets forth the philosophical principles on which each school of criticism is based, is next. The Methodology section follows and serves as a “how-to” manual for explaining the techniques used by the various schools of criticism to formulate their interpretations of a text based upon their philosophical assumptions. All chapters in the third edition have received careful editing, with added terminology and scope of coverage. Throughout each of these sections, all key terms are in boldface type and are included in the new Glossary that appears at the back of this edition.

After the Methodology section, there is an expanded Questions for Analysis section in Chapters 3 through 11. This feature provides students with key questions to ask of a text in order to view that text from the perspective of the school of criticism under discussion. Some of the questions also ask students to apply their new-found knowledge to a particular text. Following this section is the Student Essay introduction, which poses critical questions to prepare students to read the example essay at the end of the Chapter. As in the first two editions, this undergraduate Student Essay provides an example for analysis, in which a student applies the principles and methods of interpretation of the school of criticism under discussion to one of nine primary texts in the Literary Selections. All of these primary texts can be found at the back of this edition.

Following the Student Essay warm-up is an updated Further Reading section. More comprehensive than in the first two editions, these selected references complement the more extensive References section found at the end of the text. After the Further Reading section, an updated Web Sites section appears that provides additional avenues of exploration for each of the schools of criticism. It is often the case that these World Wide Web addresses include links to other sites, thus providing opportunities to venture into the ever-expanding world of literary theory.

Since Literary Criticism is an introductory text, the explanations of the various schools of criticism should not be viewed as exhaustive but as a first step toward an understanding of some rather difficult concepts, principles, and methodologies. Similarly, the student essays should not be viewed as literary masterpieces but as undergraduate attempts to employ differing literary theories. Instructors and students alike should feel free to critique these essays and explore both their strengths and weaknesses. After reading each of the chapters in this new edition, it is hoped that readers will continue their own investigations of literary theory by exploring advanced theoretical texts and the primary works of both theoretical and practical critics.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Believing in the intertextuality of texts, I readily acknowledge that the creation of this text involved an intricate web of relationships with many people. First, to those students who enrolled in my literary criticism classes, I say a big thank you. Your thoughtful questions, your oral presentations, and your countless written essays helped me crystallize my thinking about many complex theoretical issues of literary criticism. Without you, this book could not have been written. In particular, I wish to thank those students who contributed new essays for this edition: Jennifer Douglas, Conie Krause, Lori Huth, and Wendy Rader. I am also deeply grateful to Christopher Smith and Jonathan Sponsler for their many hours exploring literary sites on the World Wide Web. To Houghton College I am also thankful. By generously awarding me several mini-sabbaticals, released time from teaching, and a laptop computer, you have made this book possible. Special thanks must go to my academic dean, Dr. Ron Oakerson, for his continued moral and academic support. In addition, my fellow faculty members of the Department of English and Communication have also encouraged me in my research and writing. Thank you one and all, with special thanks to Willis Beardsley for his ever-faithful friendship and help. Words of gratitude must also be expressed for my editor at Prentice Hall, Carrie Brandon. Her gentle prodding, her kind words, her superb editing, and all her other professional advice have been extremely appreciated. Special thanks to senior production editor Shelly Kupperman, to copyeditor Diane Garvey Nesin, and to proofreader Genevieve Coyne for their guidance and helpful suggestions. I'd also like to thank the reviewers of the third edition: George Evans Light, Mississippi State University; Cornelia Wells, William Paterson University; Philip J. Burns, Worcester State College; Edward A. Shannon, Ramapo College; Rachel Crawford, University of San Francisco; Connie R. Phillips, Warner Pacific College; Alison M. Perry, University of Colorado at Boulder; Howard A. Kerner, Polk Community College; and Jose M. Blanco, Miami-Dade Community College. Most of all, I must express my undying love and appreciation to my best friend and wife, Darlene: you are my first and most loved editor, my life's companion, and my joy. Thanks for allowing me freedom from the many chores of life to pursue countless hours of research and writing to complete this project. And to my daughter, Heidi, know that you are the apple of my eye. Your personal encouragement to keep on keeping on has always been and will forever be eternally appreciated. Without the help of all of these excellent students, colleagues, and companions, this book would not have been conceived or written. Any errors in this text, however, are solely mine.

*Charles E. Bressler
Houghton, New York*

Contents

Foreword ix

To the Reader xii

1 Defining Criticism, Theory, and Literature 1

- Eavesdropping on a Literature Classroom 1
- Can a Text Have More Than One Interpretation? 3
- How to Become a Literary Critic 3
- What Is Literary Criticism? 4
- What Is Literary Theory? 6
- Making Meaning from Text 7
- The Reading Process and Literary Theory 8
- What Is Literature? 10
- Literary Theory and the Definition of Literature 12
- The Function of Literature and Literary Theory 13
- Beginning the Formal Study of Literary Theory 14
- Further Reading 15

2 A Historical Survey of Literary Criticism 16

- Introduction 16
- Plato (ca. 427–347 B.C.) 16
- Aristotle (384–322 B.C.) 18
- Horace (65–8 B.C.) 21
- Longinus (First Century A.D.) 22
- Dante Alighieri (1265–1321) 23
- Sir Philip Sidney (1554–1586) 24
- John Dryden (1631–1700) 24
- Alexander Pope (1688–1744) 25
- William Wordsworth (1770–1850) 26
- Hippolyte Adolphe Taine (1828–1893) 29
- Matthew Arnold (1822–1888) 30
- Henry James (1843–1916) 32
- Modern Literary Criticism 34
- Further Reading 35

3 New Criticism 37

Introduction	37
Historical Development	39
Assumptions	42
Methodology	45
Questions for Analysis	48
Sample Essay	48
Further Reading	49
Web Sites for Exploration	49
Student Essay:
Dale Schuurman, Keats's "To Autumn": Verses of Praise for a Malicious Season?	50

4 Reader-Response Criticism 55

Introduction	55
Historical Development	57
Assumptions	61
Methodology	63
Questions for Analysis	69
Sample Essay	70
Further Reading	70
Web Sites for Exploration	71
Student Essay:
Jennifer Douglas, "Ethan Brand's" Challenge to Me	72

5 Structuralism 75

Introduction	75
Historical Development	76
Assumptions	82
Methodologies	84
Questions for Analysis	89
Sample Essay	89
Further Reading	90
Web Sites for Exploration	90
Student Essay:
Conie Krause, Will the Real Walter Mitty Please Wake Up: A Structuralist's View of "The Secret Life of Walter Mitty"	91

6 Deconstruction 94

Structuralism and Poststructuralism: Two Views of the World	94
Modernity	96
Poststructuralism or Postmodernism	98

Historical Development	100
Assumptions	104
Methodology	107
American Deconstructors	113
Questions for Analysis	114
Sample Essay	114
Further Reading	115
Web Sites for Exploration	115
Student Essay:
Jennifer Douglas, Deconstructing a “Real” House	116
7 Psychoanalytic Criticism	119
Introduction	119
Historical Development	121
Assumptions	132
Methodologies	133
Questions for Analysis	135
Sample Essay	136
Further Reading	136
Web Sites for Exploration	137
Student Essay:
David Johnson, A Psychoanalytic Approach to Poe’s “The City in the Sea”	137
8 Feminism	142
Introduction	142
Historical Development	144
Assumptions	153
Methodology	154
Questions for Analysis	156
Sample Essay	156
Further Reading	157
Web Sites for Exploration	157
Student Essay:
Lori Huth, Throwing Off the Yoke: “Rip Van Winkle” and Women	158
9 Marxism	161
Introduction	161
Historical Development	162
Assumptions	170
Methodology	172
Questions for Analysis	173

Sample Essay	174
Further Reading	174
Web Sites for Exploration	175
Student Essay:
Juanita Wolfe, Baking Bread for the Bourgeoisie	175

10 Cultural Poetics 179

or New Historicism

Introduction	179
Historical Development	181
Assumptions	185
Methodology	188
Questions for Textual Analysis	190
Questions for Analysis	191
Sample Essay	191
Further Reading	191
Web Sites for Exploration	192
Student Essay:
Krista Adlhock, Hawthorne's Understanding of History in "The Maypole of Merry Mount"	193

11 Cultural Studies 197

Introduction	197
Postcolonialism: "The Empire Writes Back"	199
Historical Development of Postcolonialism	200
Assumptions of Postcolonialist Theory	202
Methodology	204
Questions for Analysis	205
Postcolonialism and African American Criticism	205
Gender Studies: New Directions in Feminism	208
Sample Essay	209
Further Reading	209
Web Sites for Exploration	210
Student Essay:
Wendy Rader, "The Gentlemen of the Jungle": Or Are They Beasts?	211

Literary Selections 214

John Keats, "To Autumn"	214
Nathaniel Hawthorne, "Ethan Brand"	215
James Thurber, "The Secret Life of Walter Mitty"	228
Sandra Cisneros, "The House on Mango Street"	232
Edgar Allan Poe, "The City in the Sea"	233
Washington Irving, "Rip Van Winkle"	235
Tony Harrison, "Marked with D."	248
Nathaniel Hawthorne, "The Maypole of Merry Mount"	248
Jomo Kenyatta, "The Gentlemen of the Jungle"	256

Glossary 260

References 289

Credits 312

Index 314

Defining Criticism, Theory, and Literature

Literary theory has permeated our thinking to the point that it has defined for our times how discourse about literature, as well as about culture in general, shall proceed. Literary theory has arrived, and no student of literature can afford not to come to terms with it.

Thomas McLaughlin, Critical Terms for Literary Study

EAVESDROPPING ON A LITERATURE CLASSROOM

Having assigned her literature class Flannery O'Connor's short story "A Good Man Is Hard to Find" and knowing O'Connor's canon and her long list of curious protagonists, Professor Sally Blackwell could not anticipate whether her students would greet her with silence, bewilderment, or frustration when asked to discuss this work. Her curiosity would soon be satisfied, for as she stood before the class, she asked a seemingly simple, direct question: "What do you believe O'Connor is trying to tell us in this story? In other words, how do you, as readers, interpret this text?"

Although some students suddenly found the covers of their anthologies fascinating, others shot up their hands. Given a nod from Professor Blackwell, Alice was the first to respond. "I believe O'Connor is trying to tell us the state of the family in rural Georgia during the 1950s. Just look at how the children, June Star and John Wesley, behave. They don't respect their grandmother. In fact, they mock her."

"But she deserves to be mocked," interrupted Peter. "Her life is one big act. She wants to act like a lady—to wear white cotton gloves and carry a purse—but she really cares only for herself. She is selfish, self-centered, and arrogant."

"That may be," responded Karen, "but I think the real message of O'Connor's story is not about family or one particular character, but about a philosophy of life. O'Connor uses the Misfit to articulate her personal view of life. When the Misfit says Jesus has thrown 'everything off balance,' O'Connor is really asking each of her readers to choose his or her own way of life or to follow the teachings of Jesus. In effect, O'Connor is saying we all have a choice: to live for ourselves or to live for and through others."

"I don't think we should bring Christianity or any other philosophy or religion into the story," said George. "Through analyzing O'Connor's individual words—words like tall, dark, and deep—and noting how often she repeats them and in what context, we can deduce that O'Connor's text, not O'Connor herself or her view of life, is melancholy and a bit dark. But to equate O'Connor's personal philosophy about life with the meaning of this particular story is somewhat silly."

"But we can't forget that O'Connor is a woman," said Betty, "and an educated one at that! Her story has little to do with an academic or pie-in-the-sky, meaningless philosophical discussion, but a lot to do with being a woman. Being raised in the South, O'Connor would know and would have experienced prejudice because she is a woman. And as we all know, the Southern male's opinion of women is that they are to be kept 'barefoot, pregnant, and in the kitchen.' Seemingly, they are to be as nondescript as Bailey's wife is in this story. Unlike all the other characters, we don't even know this woman's name. How much more nondescriptive could O'Connor be? O'Connor's message, then, is simple: Women are oppressed and suppressed. If they open their mouths, if they have an opinion, and if they voice that opinion, they will end up like the grandmother, with a bullet in their head."

"I don't think that's her point at all," said Barb. "I do agree that she is writing from personal experience about the South, but her main point is about prejudice itself—prejudice against African Americans. Through the voice of the Grandmother we see the Southern lady's opinion of African Americans: They are inferior to whites, uneducated, poor, and basically ignorant. O'Connor's main point is that we are all equal."

"Yes, I agree," said Mike. "But if we look at this story in the context of all the other stories we have read this semester, I see a theme we have discussed countless times before: appearance versus reality. This is O'Connor's main point. The grandmother acts like a lady—someone who cares greatly about others—but inwardly she cares only for herself. She's a hypocrite."

"I disagree. In fact, I disagree with everybody," announced Daniel. "I like the grandmother. She reminds me of my grandmother. O'Connor's grandmother is a bit self-centered, but whose old grandmother isn't? Like my grandma, O'Connor's grandmother likes to be around her grandchildren, to read and to play with them. She's funny, and she has spunk. And she even likes cats."

"But, Professor Blackwell, can we ever know what Flannery O'Connor really thinks about this story?" asked Jessica. "After all, she's dead, and she didn't write an essay titled 'What 'A Good Man Is Hard to Find' Really Means.' And since she never tells us its meaning, can't the story have more than one meaning?"