ABSTRACT

The purpose of this dissertation was to assess the impact of African urbanization on the role of the traditional family as perceived among the Akamba immigrants in Nairobi, Kenya. A further purpose was to assess how the Akamba immigrants, and in particular the Christian families in Nairobi cope with the resulting changes.

Content analysis was made of field data to discover the way in which these families have adjusted to cope with the impact on the part played by the family in traditional society. Data analyzed showed that in traditional society, the family was responsible for the individual's need for identity, economic support and the enculturation of the children. However, due to urbanization and its forces of change, the traditional family was described as weak and fragmented. Hence, playing no part in ones need for identity, support and enculturation of the young generation.

But with these changes, data analyzed shows that the Akamba families function and that the individual's need for identity, support and enculturation were met through urban based institutions, ethnic-based associations, community gatherings and rural visitations, the Akamba families try to have their key needs met. In this quest for survival in the city, the study showed that the church for which the above mentioned families are members has not been helpful in meeting these concerns.

These findings, though related to one ethnic society in Kenya, should have value for the church in the African city and particular the Africa Inland Church in Nairobi. The findings are also in general sense of value to other Christian churches involved in evangelism and church planting in the African cities and perhaps in cities of developing nations. They should have value to concerned observers, missiologists, Church leaders and mission agencies seeking to understand the contemporary African urban society.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Although this dissertation bears the name of one writer, in a true sense it represents the work of many.

The writer has particularly benefited from the skillful direction and constant counsel of his mentor, Paul G. Hiebert, the director of dissertation committee. Particular appreciation is due to Lois McKinney, the writer's second reader for constant encouragement.

Special thanks for to Betsy Brokaw, for her unreserved assistance in editing the manuscript and David Higgins for his help in computer technology. The prayers and financial support from Church of the Redeemer are appreciated. Thanks to other friends who come to mind: The Norton family, Dick and Helen Norton, Debby Jonathan and Susan Enlow. That goes too to the Africa Inland Church, Mumbuni District Church Council in Machakos, Kenya for granting a leave of absence from pastoral duties in order to complete this dissertation.

The writer will live to remember the many sacrifices cheerfully accepted by his wife, Alice Mumbi and children, Mueni and Mumo. Without them this dissertation would not have been completed.

Praise to God for his faithfulness through it all.

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this investigation is to assess the impact of African urbanization on the role of the traditional family among the Akamba immigrant families in Nairobi, Kenya. A further purpose is to evaluate the ways in which these families adapt in order to cope with the resulting changes. The ultimate goal is to discover the missiological implications for the urban ministry of the church, and in particular, the Africa Inland Church (AIC) which is one of the largest denominations in Kenya.

The Background to the Study

The eruption is described by some scholars as the dominant social reality facing the church in post-independent tropical Africa. Ever since the middle of the last century, Africans by the millions, says William Bascom (1975), are migrating into the cities and town centers of Africa, south of the Sahara in particular. Bascom writes.

In millions Africans have been moving from rural areas into the cities. The rate of urbanization has been increasing and there is no sign of decline (1975, 234).

His observation is also supported by the writings of numerous African observers, social scientists and missiologists. Among them, Stan Downs (1989_); Aylward Shorter (1991); Timothy Monsma (1977, 79) and Anthony O'Connor (1983), just to mention a few. These scholars tell us that the rate of rural-urban migration in tropical Africa has escalated in recent years. O'Connor (1983) for example says that,

The present rates of urbanization, in the sense of progressive increase in the proportion of the total population who live in cities and towns, are among the world's highest (1983, 15).

Eugene Linden (1993) quotes a survey report on population growth done by World Bank as saying that, "some of Africa's cities are growing by 1-% per year, the swiftest rate of urbanization ever recorded" (1991, 31). According to David Barrett (1988), the pace of urbanization in tropical Africa is now swifter than has been the case in advanced nations. This rapid urbanization is exactly what is happening in many African nations where it is predicted that by the year 2025, four of the world's largest cities will be found. These cities are projected to be Kinshasa, Nairobi, Lagos and Cairo, each with more than 16 million inhabitants (Downes 1989, 11).

As the growing Christian church in this continent enters into the twenty first century, this dominant social reality poses critical questions. With rapid urbanization and importation of western cultural norms, Leslie Newbigin (1986) claims, there comes a number of intriguing questions regarding the immigrant multi-ethnic societies. Take for example, the constant movement within the city and between the city and rural homeland. This is an increasing phenomenon ever since the end of the colonial era (Muwonge 1980; Obudho 1984). Why do immigrants, in the African cities maintain that constant movement back and forth between their homelands and the city? What accounts for this increasing phenomenon which is not in keeping with the notion held by some scholars that urbanization breaks down urban-rural ties?

On the other hand, what is to be said about the immigrants' solidarity and unity in what Kenneth Little (1974) refers to as friendship associations? What is to be said about their urban loyalty in welfare associate groups such as those Marc W. Ross (1975) found among the Kenyans in Nairobi? What can be said about the urban society's involvement in community development functions, the harambee movement, crisis-oriented associate groups such as funerals which are common to the immigrant society? What are the explanations for ethnic identifications noticeable to any casual observer among the immigrants in the cities like Nairobi? What is to be said about this ongoing trend that continues to plague the urban society in tropical Africa?

To the church in the African city, and in particular the Africa Inland Church in Nairobi (Appendix A) which is the focus of this study, there are no simple answers to these complex questions. The urban Africans' financial and time commitments to these associate groups, not to mention their constant movement between city and rural homes raises many more questions than answers. Currently statistics are lacking by
