

MICROFOUNDATIONS OF ECONOMIC SUCCESS

Lessons from Estonia

Edited by

DAVID G. MAYES

F151.160
M626

Microfoundations of Economic Success

Lessons from Estonia

---

Edited by

David G. Mayes

Director, Europe Institute, University of Auckland, New Zealand; Adjunct Professor, National Centre for Research on Europe, University of Canterbury, New Zealand and formerly Advisor to the Board, Bank of Finland, Finland.

Edward Elgar

Cheltenham, UK • Northampton, MA, USA

E2009003644

© David G. Mayes 2009

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical or photocopying, recording, or otherwise without the prior permission of the publisher.

Published by Edward Elgar Publishing Limited
The Lypiatts
15 Lansdown Road
Cheltenham
Glos GL50 2JA
UK

Edward Elgar Publishing, Inc.
William Pratt House
9 Dewey Court
Northampton
Massachusetts 01060
USA

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Control Number: 2009921530

ISBN 978 1 84720 929 0

Printed and bound by MPG Books Group, UK

Microfoundations of Economic Success

List of Contributors

---

Aurelijus Dabušinskas

Dmitry Kulikov

David G. Mayes

Annika Paabut

Martti Randveer

Tairi Rõõm

Karsten Staehr

Lenno Uusküla

Priit Vahter

The contributors are or have all been members of the Research Department at Eesti Pank, the Estonian central bank, over the years that have generated this work. Martti Randveer has been Head of the Department throughout and David Mayes has been Research Advisor to the Bank, on loan from his post as Advisor to the Board at the Bank of Finland. David Mayes is currently Director of the Europe Institute at the University of Auckland. Karsten Staehr is also at Tallinn Technical University.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The contributors thank colleagues in Eesti Pank who have helped with this work and offered constructive comments. Special thanks go to Liina Kulu who helped put the book together and to Märten Ross, the Deputy Governor responsible for research, who encouraged the work. Specific acknowledgements for the data behind the chapters and to others who contributed are appended to each chapter. This book would not have reached publication without the help of Janet Mayes who transformed the typescript into camera-ready copy. The work is the responsibility of the individual authors and may not represent any views that may be held by Eesti Pank.

Foreword

---

Since the middle of the 1990s the performance of the Estonian economy has exceeded expectations. During 1995–2007 we have experienced the fastest economic growth in the enlarged European Union. As a result, our relative income level vis-à-vis the other EU countries has doubled from 35 per cent of EU average in 1995 to 70 per cent in 2007. The anti-inflationary nature of our monetary regime – the currency board arrangement – and disciplined fiscal policy has led to the lowest public sector debt in the EU and nominal interest rates comparable to the euro area countries. Although recently inflation has increased due to commodity price shocks and cyclical factors, the average inflation rate during that period has remained below 4 per cent.

In addition to these favourable macroeconomic developments, an important aspect of Estonia's success has been the ability to cope with significant changes in both the domestic and foreign environments. The main shocks from the external environment – the economic and financial crises in Asia and Russia in 1997–98 – had a strong impact on the Estonian economy. They led to significantly tighter financing conditions and lower foreign demand. The most revealing characteristic of the subsequent decline in economic activity was its short-lived nature. In less than two years the Estonian financial sector was on a considerably stronger foundation and exports underwent a significant reorientation from the CIS markets to EU countries.

As important as the successful handling of external shocks has been the ability of the corporate sector to cope with constant restructuring. Although less noticed, high economic growth has masked different trends in different sectors. Indeed there has been surprising heterogeneity in the performance of the different sectors of the economy. This is most evident in manufacturing, where labour and resource-based industries have seen a constant decline and the share of more knowledge and technology-based sectors has expanded.

Successful managing of external and internal shocks requires considerable economic flexibility. Such flexibility stems from the micro-foundations of the economy – the ability of the firms and individuals to react to changing market conditions, to innovate, taking advantage of new ideas and opportunities, and to survive in strong competitive pressures. All these topics are covered in the chapters of this book. Specifically, the authors analyse how innovation and competitive pressures have influenced the productivity of the Estonian firms, how firms set their prices and wages and react to various economic shocks. The authors also address the question how individuals shape their decisions regarding consumption, saving and working.

While these chapters may be seen as case studies of academic interest, their importance for policy makers is not limited to explaining the past success of the Estonian economy. These questions remain crucial also for the foreseeable future. The slowdown in economic activity that started in 2007 and has lately been reinforced by the unprecedented financial sector difficulties in both the US and several European countries will certainly test the flexibility of the Estonian firms and individuals in the coming years. Looking at the longer perspective, the maintenance of the currency board arrangement until the adoption of the euro and the subsequent participation in the euro-area, which both eliminate the possibility to conduct independent discretionary monetary policy, will place increased importance on the flexibility of the economy to cope with the changes in the economic environment. Therefore the topics covered in the book will remain an integral part of the economic analysis in Eesti Pank.

The Research Department in Eesti Pank has deliberately followed a programme of research into the nature of the flexibility in the Estonian economy and its causes. We have seen this as a key priority for the success of a currency boards-based monetary policy. With monetary policy unable to respond to shocks that are specific to Estonia, other facets of behaviour must respond instead to limit the impact on incomes and employment. If other countries have discovered routes to flexibility that Estonia has not then clearly we would want to know about it and see how they could be emulated. However, in most respects this work can be of benefit to other countries. The currency board forces flexibility and hence the Estonian experience may offer ideas for others.

Unlike many sources of economic benefit, flexibility is not something whose benefit diminishes if others adopt it. Rather the opposite – if other countries can also weather shocks at lower cost and recover more rapidly some of this will spin over to the benefit of Estonia. I hope therefore that others will also find the work of Eesti Pank valuable in this regard.

Andres Lipstok

Governor of Eesti Pank

Contents

---

List of Figures	vi
List of Tables	viii
List of Contributors	xi
Foreword	xii
1. The Path of Transition in Estonia David G. Mayes and Martti Randveer	1
2. Comparison of Pricing Behaviour of Firms in the Euro Area and Estonia Aurelijus Dabušinskas and Martti Randveer	19
3. The Principles of Wage Formation in Estonian Companies Tairi Rõõm and Lenno Uusküla	77
4. Productivity in Estonian Enterprises: the Role of Innovation and Competition Priit Vahter	131
5. Liquidity and Productivity Shocks: a Look at Sectoral Firm Creation Lenno Uusküla	168
6. A Microeconomic Analysis of Household Saving in Estonia: Income, Wealth and Financial Exposure Dmitry Kulikov, Annika Paabut and Karsten Staehr	190
7. Estimates of Employment and Welfare Effects of Personal Labour Income Taxation in a Flat-Tax Country Karsten Staehr	242
8. Outlook David G. Mayes and Martti Randveer	291
Index	305

List of Figures

---

1.1	Estonia GDP per capita using PPPs (EU-15=100) in 1995–2007	10
1.2	The dynamics of consumer prices in 1993–2007	11
1.3	The dynamics of interest rates in 1997–2006	11
1.4	Forward points in 2001–2006	12
1.5	Government debt and fiscal balance in 1995–2007	13
2.1	Mark-up rule and perceived competition	41
2.2	Price discrimination	42
2.3	Asymmetries in price-driving factors	58
3.1	The competitive environment in Estonia and the euro area	90
3.2	Percentage change in the unit labour cost	91
3.3	Wage growth in surveyed companies in 2004	95
3.4	Calendar months during which wages are usually changed	102
4.1	Relationship between competition, innovation and productivity	135
4A.1	Descriptive statistics – dynamics of the unweighted average of value added per employee in manufacturing (in EEK)	165
4A.2	Descriptive statistics – dynamics of the unweighted average of value added per employee in services sector (in EEK)	166
5.1	Impulse response functions to an expansionary standard deviation shock in liquidity	174
5.2	Impulse response functions to an expansionary standard deviation shock in liquidity	175
5.3	Impulse response functions to a positive standard deviation shock in labour productivity	176
5.4	Impulse response functions to a positive standard deviation shock in labour productivity	177
6.1	Gross saving rates in Estonia based on National Accounts data, 2002–2005	195
6.2	Financial assets and liabilities of Estonian households, 2002–2005	197
6.3	The log regular income and the log income shock against the saving rate, 2002–2005	202
7.1	Monthly working hours, intervals of 20 hours	251

7.2	Hourly labour income and monthly working time, logarithms	253
7.3	The marginal cost of public funds from a tax increase	280
8.1	The structure of inflation in Estonia	294
8.2	Risk scenarios	295
8.3	Annual HICP inflation in the Eurozone and the inflation reference value, monthly frequency, 1999:01–2008:06	296
8.4	Annual HICP inflation in 13 EMU countries and the inflation reference value, monthly frequency, 1999:01–2008:06	297
8.5	Inflation reference values for EU15 and EU27 respectively, per cent per year. Difference of inflation reference values between EU27 and EU15, percentage points	298
8.6	Probability distributions of inflation reference value with 15 and 27 EU countries respectively	299
8.7	Annual HICP inflation in the Baltic countries, monthly frequency, 1999:01–2008:06	299
8.8	GDP per capita and relative price levels, 2007	300

List of Tables

---

1.1	Comparison of the frequency of price changes (per year) between Estonia and euro area	14
1.2	The speed of price adjustment after a shock in Estonia and euro area	14
1.3	The role of entry and exit of firms – decomposition of the TFP of all Estonian firms	15
2.1	Sectoral coverage, percentages (number of firms in brackets)	23
2.2	Firm size, based on the number of employees	24
2.3	Market structure	27
2.4	Firms following mainly time-dependent rules	30
2.5	Firms following both time- and state-dependent rules	31
2.6	Information used in pricing decisions	32
2.7	Information used in pricing decisions by sector	34
2.8	Frequency of price reviews per year	35
2.9	Frequency of price reviews per year by sector	36
2.10	Price setting rules	38
2.11	Price setting rules by sector	39
2.12	Frequency of price changes per year	43
2.13	Comparison of price reviews and price changes per year	44
2.14	Ranking of theories explaining price stickiness	46
2.15	The scores of explaining of price stickiness – goods sector	50
2.16	The scores of explaining of price stickiness – trade sector	51
2.17	The scores of explaining of price stickiness – services sector	52
2.18	Speed of price adjustment after shocks	54
2.19	Firms not adjusting their prices in response to a shock	55
2.20	The importance of different factors driving price increases	56
2.21	The importance of different factors driving price decreases	57
3.1	Dynamics of the minimum wage in 1999–2005	87
3.2	The developments in the tax burden on labour (excluding value added tax) across different labour income levels	88
3.3	Selected indicators of Estonian economy, 1998–2005	91

3.4	Overview of answers to the question: 'If the company had to reduce wages by 20 per cent owing to economic recession, how would the factors mentioned below hinder the implementation of this decision?'	96
3.5	Proportion of performance-related bonuses in total pay	97
3.6	Share of enterprises paying performance-related bonuses	98
3.7	Distribution of remuneration methods	99
3.8	Frequency of wage changes	100
3.9	Frequency of wage changes and different remuneration methods	101
3.10	How fast do different factors affect wages, including paid bonuses?	103
3.11	Factors influencing wage changes	106
3.12	The proportion of companies paying the minimum wage to at least one worker and the share of employees receiving the minimum wage	110
3.13	How relevant are the following factors in order to ensure that the employees work more efficiently?	113
4.1	Descriptive statistics – coefficients from a Cobb-Douglas type of production function (relaxing the assumption of CRS) in manufacturing sectors	143
4.2	Descriptive statistics, coefficients from a Cobb-Douglas type of production function (relaxing the assumption of CRS), LP method vs simple FE model in the services sectors	145
4.3	Productivity spread in Estonia in 1995 and 2002	147
4.4	TFP spread, the ratio of the highest decile to the lowest decile	148
4.5	TFP transition matrix, manufacturing sector 1995–2002	150
4.6	TFP transition matrix, services sector 1995–2002	150
4.7	Unconditional mean analysis of productivity according to the innovativeness of the firm in the year 2000	153
4.8	Regression results for the year 2000, TFP premium and innovative activities of the firm	154
4.9	Transition matrix between firms that spend on R&D and those that do not	155
4.10	Productivity/competition relation in the manufacturing sector, estimated in first differences	158
4.11	Productivity/competition relation in the services sector, estimated in first differences	159
4A.1	Descriptive statistics from the Business Register database	164

4A.2	Labour productivity (sales/employees) transition matrix, manufacturing sector	167
4A.3	Labour productivity (sales/employees) transition matrix, services sector	167
5.1	Variance decomposition for the liquidity shock	179
5.2	Variance decomposition for the neutral technology shock	180
5.3	Variance decomposition for the liquidity shock	181
5.4	Variance decomposition for the neutral technology shock	181
5A.1	Detailed description of variables	186
5A.2	Stationarity analysis of main variables	187
5A.3	Stationarity analysis of firm creation in differences by sectors	188
5A.4	Stationarity analysis results for additional variables	189
6.1	Means and standard deviations of income, consumption and saving variables	201
6.2	Definitions of variables used in the empirical models of household saving behaviour	207
6.3	Determinants of the household saving rate SRATE, 2002–2005	211
6.4	LAD, bootstrap and IV estimation results of the empirical saving model	219
6.5	Sub-sample results for the determinants of the household saving rate SRATE, 2002–2005	225
6.6	Sub-sample results for the determinants of the household saving rate SRATE, 2002–2005	229
6.7	Sub-sample results for the determinants of the household saving rate SRATE, 2002–2005	234
6A.1	Descriptive statistics of variables	240
7.1	Notation, description and summary statistics of main variables	255
7.2	Estimation of log labour income per hour of employed individuals (LHPAY)	260
7.3	Estimates of monthly logarithmic working hours with selection	264
7.4	Estimation of monthly logarithmic working hours with selection, four sub-samples	271
7.5	Summary statistics for the four income groups	274
7.6	The effects of two tax experiments on employment and tax revenue	278
7.7	The marginal cost of public funds, two different tax policies	281
7A.1	Estimates of monthly working hours without selection	289
8.1	Economic forecast for Estonia, by main indicators	293

1. The Path of Transition in Estonia

David G. Mayes and Martti Randveer

---

Almost all transition countries have been through a very fraught process of rapid economic collapse on their emergence from the communist regime, accompanied by high inflation. After a few years they managed to turn the economy round, get inflation down and start to rebuild only to be faced by a second setback associated with the Asian crises in 1997 and the Russian default in 1998. Following a further recovery, the economies have begun to take off in a serious manner with growth rates well ahead of their western counterparts, reaching double figures in some cases. The path to convergence therefore seems well set, although 2007 and 2008 have shown that some of these growth rates were not sustainable and the Baltic States in particular have encountered a sudden stop, albeit one that is likely to be temporary.

Not surprisingly, each country has faced its own unique problems but in this book we look at the case of Estonia, for two main reasons. First of all, Estonia started from one of the more difficult positions as it was actually part of the Soviet Union. Its position was not as difficult as countries such as Ukraine that had been part of the Soviet Union from the outset and had hence had over 70 years of communist rule, long enough that there was no-one with knowledge and experience of how to operate in the modern western system. While the diaspora may have that knowledge, they lack the local experience. Estonia became independent after World War One and was only absorbed into the Soviet Union at the outset of World War Two (and occupied by Germany for a substantial period during it). Nevertheless, nearly 50 years without the opportunity to gain western-style experience (except perhaps for the opportunity to watch Finnish television illegally in the North) meant that the challenge for change was enormous.

Our second reason is simply that Estonia has been one of the most successful countries in making the transformation and has moved from a per capita income 33 per cent of the EU average in 1995 to 70 per cent in 2007. Another decade of that sort of performance would close the gap with the West.

West. We seek to investigate what lies behind that success through a detailed study of the operation of the Estonian economy.

It is normally argued that an economy will succeed for four main reasons.

- Its economic structure is focused on rapidly growing sectors of world demand.
- It has an advantageous structure of inputs, such as raw materials, a growing and highly qualified workforce, good access to deep capital markets.
- Its ability to innovate and respond rapidly to the changes in demand and shocks to supply that affect its competitiveness.
- It has a set of economic and political institutions, regulatory framework and attitude to the rule of law that facilitates growth.

These four facets can be put together in a variety of ways, one of the best known of which is the Porter diamond (Porter, 1990). There the focus is very much on how competition actually operates and spurs action. In all such explanations success comes from an appropriate combination of inputs and assets, markets, the competitive process and the public legal and institutional environment.

Estonia is not an obvious choice for success under these criteria. It is not particularly well positioned to address the major markets of Europe and the rest of the world. Its location is relatively peripheral, but then the success of Ireland and Finland among others suggests that peripherality per se is not necessarily a drawback. It does not have any good natural resource base and the climate is relatively unfavourable. Moreover it is small, so it is difficult to reap economies of scale, impossible to develop market power and hence may have relatively high cost structures.

Nevertheless, much of the source of growth for the transition economies comes from the disparity between their potential and their initial performance. Put another way, it is difficult to see what Estonia has that would make it unable to compete directly with its successful neighbour Finland. In many respects the position of Finland is worse, although it is seven times as large a country geographically and has three times the population of Estonia. It has fewer natural resources, an even harsher climate and is slightly more peripheral in location. In simple terms, therefore, other things being equal, the question is simply how long will it take Estonia to acquire similar levels of physical capital and business reputation and intellectual capital. Like other transition economies the requirement is to move to the frontier of feasible activity. Only later will it be a question of advancing the frontier. However, in practice economic development is a much more uneven process. Estonia is already at the frontier in some areas. The Skype inter-computer communications system that permits video-telephoning between countries at the cost of a local call was developed in Estonia, thus some of Estonia's growth is at, not inside the frontier.

The key to the successful growth is thus likely to lie, in part, in markets and the highly skilled workforce but mainly in the structure of competition, the legal framework and the role of the public sector. Estonia is not simply a highly dynamic economy but one that can change readily. Firms are able to react swiftly to changes in demand and to new ideas and opportunities. The labour market is similarly flexible with relatively limited costs of hiring and firing. Part of this reflects the fact that social benefits and other aspects of social protection were at a low level initially. The chronic inflation had eroded the real value of benefits from the previous regime and there was no basis on which a new safety net could be built up except slowly. The effect was extremely harsh on those who were not readily able to get a new job, either through age or lack of relevant skills. Yet on the other hand, low tax rates meant that the incentives to work harder, get training and look for better jobs were very strong.

In this book we look at how these incentives work, focusing on how firms and households have managed to be so flexible. However inward investment also has a strong role to play with its embodied technological advance that enables very high growth rates. Those employed can adopt new technologies and increase their output markedly. Estonia's proximity to Finland and the enormous attractiveness of its capital Tallinn in particular has been given a huge boost from tourism. Proximity to much higher-income countries in the Nordic region has meant that Estonia is not just a cheap and attractive location to visitors but also that relatively high prices can be charged compared to what locals pay, to enable good profitability and investment.

THE STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK

The chapters in this book all reflect work done in the Bank of Estonia as part of a continuing research programme to understand how the Estonian economy responds to shocks. Since monetary policy in Estonia is passive, as it runs a currency board with a fixed exchange rate with the euro, all adjustment to shocks has to occur through other mechanisms in the economy. Indeed fiscal policy is also somewhat restrained compared to most other European countries. Part of the task of the central bank is to help decision makers in the public and private sectors both inside and outside the country understand the challenges the economy faces from shocks and the way in which known and potential shocks may impact over the coming years. The currency board exists to maintain price stability and confidence in the currency. By providing better information the Bank of Estonia can help the adjustment process.

The book begins therefore in Chapter 2 by looking directly at the inflationary process in Estonia. Aurelijus Dabušinskas, and Martti Randveer explore how firms actually set prices through a detailed survey of a large sample of firms in the economy. This study was undertaken in parallel with a similar study done by the European System of Central Banks (ESCB) for each of the then twelve euro area countries (Fabiani et al. 2005) so it is possible to compare the experiences in Estonia directly with those of much of the rest of Europe. The ESCB study was primarily aimed at finding out how persistent inflation is after a shock and how that persistence is generated in the way that firms set prices. If firms pass on cost increases in full and other firms try to keep relative prices the same, and then wage earners seek to have this increase in prices reflected in their wages, any shock will be very persistent and monetary policy will need to react very firmly if overall price stability is to be maintained. Something that will not happen for a shock that simply affects Estonia and not the euro area as a whole.

Fortunately the finding in the chapter is that Estonian firms seem to be more flexible than their competitors. As can be expected in a small country, most firms are price-takers – they look at market prices and follow them. However, rather fewer firms simply revise prices by a particular formula at regular intervals. Firms tend to respond more directly to shocks but prices appear to be relatively flexible in respect to both downward and upward shocks. In countries where inflation is more firmly rooted there is a tendency for firms to react quite quickly to positive price shocks and to errors where they have set prices too low but to be more inclined to wait for time to erode negative shocks and positive errors. In Estonia the process seems to be a little more symmetric and prices are adjusted more rapidly than in most of the euro area. However, price setters in Estonia appear to be more backward-looking than their euro area counterparts, which will help to make inflation rather more persistent.

There are thus pluses and minuses in the nature of Estonian price-setting that will affect the adjustment to shocks that are specific to Estonia. Clearly the impact on export competitiveness will depend on the behaviour of exporters, not picked up in this study, but import competitiveness will tend to be maintained with a preponderance of price taking. The key question will then be how other aspects of competitiveness respond and chapters 4 and 5 consider productivity.