Foreword

The publication of The China Directory of Industry and Commerce is a new and happy event for China's economic circles. The Directory will serve as a bridge between producers and purchasers and promote exchange and cooperation among enterprises so that they can work in closer coordination.

China has several hundred thousand enterprises with extensive economic ties among them. The situation in commodity circulation is intricate and complex, particularly in view of the fact that China has implemented in the last few years and is still implementing a series of policies to readjust and restructure the economy, such as regulating production both through planning and through the market under the guidance of the state plan; giving enterprises greater powers of decision on managerial and administrative matters and encouraging specialization, cooperation and consolidation of enterprises engaged in the same trade or in different trades.

Under this new situation, exchanges between enterprises are steadily growing, as are their economic relations with other sectors of society. These enterprises need a rational division of labor as well as cooperation in production; technically they need to learn from one another's strong points in good time; and they need to gear their operation accurately to market demand.

Growing numbers of enterprises want to buy raw materials, parts and accessories or commodities they can sell readily. At the same time, they want to sell what they produce or offer processing or other services.

Therefore, there is greater need than ever before for the enterprises and other departments to acquire information about the market, to know how things stand. Hence the publication of The China Directory of Industry and Commerce.

The Directory lists nearly 10,000 Chinese industrial and commercial enterprises, trade by trade, together with their major products and business lines. It will greatly facilitate the establishment of contacts among enterprises. And I wish to add that since the book will also be sold overseas, I believe the economic and trade circles there, too, will make full use of it to increase their economic cooperation and trade with China.

The comrades on the editorial board of The China Directory of Industry and Commerce have asked me to write a Foreword for the book and I avail myself of the opportunity to offer the above views for your reference.
