Part 1 Introduction

International non-commercial settlement is to settle imbalances in international business, international commercial settlement will continue the role best in this

Chapter 1 Import & Export with International Settlement

1.1 Import and Export

Import and Export belong to international trade. International trade is the exchange of goods and services across national boundaries. On the one hand, it involves trade transactions of both import and export. On the other hand, it includes the purchase and sale of both tangible goods and intangible services. Exports are the merchandise that individuals, companies or nations sell whereas imports are the goods and services that individuals, companies or nations purchase. Export and import share many commonalities in terms of terminology, rationale and purpose and one can be considered as the mirror image of the other. Every trade transaction, be it a business of export or import, is to create accounts, debts and claims between the importer and the exporter and their respective countries, which are to be settled through international settlement.

1.2 International Settlement

International settlement refers to the money transfer via banks to settle accounts, debts and claims among different countries. It is originated from international trade transactions, including both tangible goods transactions and intangible service transactions, as well as international non-trade transactions such as international lending and investment, international aids and grants, cross-border personal remittance, etc. For this reason, international settlement is divided into two types: international commercial settlement, which is created for the settlement of international trade, and international non-commercial settlement, which is made for non-trade transactions.

While international non-commercial settlement is of equal importance in international business, international commercial settlement will constitute the core part in this book and it will be the major focus.

International settlement centers around payment methods. There are five payment methods in international settlement: remittance, collection, factoring, letter of credit and letter of guarantee, each with its own subdivisions. Among them, remittance, collection and letter of credit are the three most popular ones in international trade.

There are two important ingredients in a payment method: financial instruments and commercial documents. Without them, payment methods are not operational.

1.3 Documents

Documents form the basis of the international settlement and they are the two important ingredients in payment methods. Therefore, documents in international settlement are divided into two broad types: financial instruments and commercial documents. Financial instruments mainly refer to bills of exchange, checks and promissory notes. The word "financial" implies that these instruments are made for the purpose of settling payments. In simple words, financial instruments are orders given to make or collect payments. When such orders are performed, payments are settled. Financial instruments are made to facilitate the payment settlement process in international trade. As international trade involves traders from different countries, to ship cash across national boundaries to settle payment is both inconvenient and dangerous for the traders. In the modern era, financial instruments have taken the place of cash and become the medium of exchange to settle payments. As a result, it is instruments, not cash that move throughout the settlement process in international trade. With the involvement of financial instruments, international settlement has moved from cash-settlement into the era of non-cash settlement.

The second ingredient in payment methods is commercial documents. Commercial documents are varied and they signify whether the responsibilities in a transaction regarding the production, packing, shipment, and/or insurance, etc. of the goods have been fulfilled by the traders. They are made to facilitate the delivery of
